I Was Newly Qualified Once

When I completed my Articles I wanted advice on what I should do next and what salary I was worth.

I went to all sorts of advisers. Each advised differently and I was even more confused, so I decided to meet as many firms as possible and four agencies arranged over 12 interviews for me.

Before each interview I asked the agents to tell me about each firm. Apart from the address (and one got that wrong) they knew very little.

Still I did the round and I was offered 11 jobs. Good - not really. Only 2 firms were suitable for me and the other 10 interviews were a waste of everybody's time.

You can use this indiscriminate method or you can seek our advice - we personally vet each appointment, thus ensuring that only pertinent introductions are arranged.

The Jargon Killers.

We think it's rather pointless talking about a computer in technical terms.

We prefer to talk to you in the language of business rather than the jargon of computers.

Because no computer can be any better than the information that goes into it.

And the system it works to.

This goes even for our NCR Century Computer, which is technically the most advanced you can buy at the price.

At NCR, we first work out the best systems for your business.

And then install the right machine and provide the right support to make the systems work.

We know what we're talking about. We've been solving business efficiency problems for a very long time.

If you're considering whether your business could benefit from a computer, make it your business to see us first.

We'll give you a considered opinion.

This is the first book especially designed and written to assist the cognizant executive in his choice of a computer system – and, through this more efficiently to plan for financial profits.

At the outset it is better to face the fact that management information systems are valuable only as long as they contribute to more effective operations. To help in this direction, the present book is very specific. It may also, in places, be controversial: only challenge can derust the old structures.

Management information systems do not develop the right way just by accident. Wise and profitable machine selection will not come about as a matter of chance. Efficiency with computers – as with any other industrial activity – definitely calls for acts of policy. Albeit, often ones that various persons and departments within the enterprise would greatly resent.

The computer (and the computer industry) has been so far a great international home of hoary myths. The time has come to demystify the whole affair. This calls for courage and for preparation. To that end, the book follows the preparatory phases through clear examples: from systems analysis, to unit runs, file specifications, programming, machine comparisons, computing estimates and the handling of the manufacturer, down to the time of decision.

Selecting the Computer System is designed to particularly appeal to:

- ★ Executives directly responsible for the choice of data processing equipment, and its implementation.
- ★ Senior executives, running operations or functional areas. (They will find in it material of substantial interest to their activities – provided they are determined to go beyond the superficial treatment of the subject.)
- ★ Graduate university students majoring in management, computers and information science.

Users of computer systems urgently need to act in a rational manner, if they are not to become toys in the hands of manufacturers. This is particularly important in 1968 when computers in business, industry and Government have passed the embryonic stage. Lately, the men responsible for computer applications have come to realize that they have either to plan completely their systems work or they had better not plan at all.

The objective of the chapters treating the mechanics of the planning work is to answer challenging questions:

- ★ Where to start?
- ★ Whom to believe in following alternative ways and means in the implementation of an electronic system?
- ★ How to keep pace with change?
- ★ How to evaluate the profitability of automatic information handling?
- ★ How to identify and set the limits of cost expansion?
- ★ Where to base the decision on the use of more powerful electronic media?
- ★ How to distinguish facts from fiction?

CHARITY NEEDS YOUR HELP — YOU NEED OURS MORE THAN TWO MILLION POUNDS A YEAR ARE DISTRIBUTED TO CHARITY THROUGH THE

CHARITIES AID FUND

The National Council of Social Service

More and more Solicitors and Accountants are advising their clients to seek our help (and are doing so themselves).

More and more individuals, firms, companies and trusts are using our services.

A single discretionary deed of covenant with C.A.F. enables the donor—individual or company—at his continuing discretion to make all his donations to charity with the benefit of Income Tax which has been recovered in advance by the Fund. He gains discretion, flexibility, administrative convenience and a greatly extended field of untaxed giving to charity.

The Fund also administers charitable gifts, bequests and trusts and will distribute any funds large or small to any charitable object. In addition it acts as the agent of many individual charities in the collection of their covenanted income.

C.A.F. is a registered Charity and a registered Friendly Society, and normally makes no charge for its services but requests that a small percentage be allocated to its parent body, the National Council of Social Service.

Potter & Monroe's Tax Planning with precedents

By D. A. SHIRLEY, M.A. and STEPHEN J. L. OLIVER, M.A.
SIXTH EDITION

Well over a thousand pages of fiscal legislation between 1965 and 1969 have rendered obsolete whole parts of the previous edition of Potter and Monroe. In particular, the Finance Act 1968 introduced the notion of aggregating with his parents' income the income of an infant where the settlor is not the infant's father or mother. In the estate duty field, the 1969 Finance Act re-cast the charging provisions of section 2 (1) (b) of the Finance Act 1894, repealing section 2 (1) (d) and abolishing non-aggregation in all cases other than where the free estate is less than £10,000 in value and settled property is dutiable under the new section 2 (1) (b). Further, the 1969 Act now imposes estate duty on the death of a beneficiary under a discretionary trust.

Elements of the Law of Income and Capital Gains Taxation

By C. N. BEATTIE, Q.C., LL.B.

NINTH EDITION

Beattie has, over eight previous editions, established itself as an excellent introduction to the subject of income tax for law students, and as a standard guide and handbook for legal practitioners. This new edition incorporates all the complex changes introduced by the Finance Acts of 1968 and 1969, and lucidly and concisely explains the new law.

The practical problems of administration, returns, assessments, appeals and penalties are covered throughout and this book provides the student with all the basic knowledge necessary for his examinations. It also provides the practising lawyer and accountant with a comprehensive outline statement of law.

The private company dilemma and how to solve it

Shareholdings of a private company director may produce insuperable problems at death, and his family's finances suffer irreparable damage.

Often the only way of raising the money to pay estate duty is an enforced sale or liquidation of the company.

Many directors believe that the only way to avoid this is to sell some of the equity to an institutional investor. And this they have always resisted.

In fact, it is possible to overcome the problem through a simple life assurance solution which may cost the director nothing and can ensure that no equity goes outside the family or families.

Auditors and Litigation

THE legendary character who once picketed the Law Courts with a banner reading 'ARBITRATE, DON'T LITIGATE' had more than a germ of reason in his message. Litigation in 1970 is liable to be an exceedingly complex and expensive business, of which the actual hearings in Court may be only the tip, and the existence of prospective or pending litigation can have a material effect upon a set of accounts.

This situation reportedly led to some extremely tough bargaining between The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales and the Law Society. The Companies Act 1948 made it compulsory to show by the way of note (and thus as part of the accounts on which auditors were required to report) the amount of any material contingent liabilities not otherwise provided for. Pending litigation affords an obvious example of such a contingency and, as noted in The Accountant of April 16th last, some firms of solicitors were becoming increasingly restive at being asked to deal with 'blanket' inquiries for audit purposes – not only because of the work involved in identifying and evaluating individual matters, but also from the fear of themselves incurring a potential liability in respect of errors or omissions.

Reproduced on another page of this issue is the text of a statement which has now been agreed by the respective councils of the Institute and of the Law Society, entitled Information by solicitors for company audit purposes. This represents a compromise in which the Law Society has maintained its position on two matters it evidently regards as fundamental, viz., that audit inquiries must be framed within the existing solicitor-client relationship, and that the primary responsibility for identifying and evaluating matters of prospective litigation must remain with the client company's directors.

The Institute has accepted that it is for the directors to ensure that proper account is taken of all liabilities (including contingent liabilities) in the preparation of company financial statements, and also suggests several specific tests which should be applied by auditors towards establishing the extent of pending litigation from the company's own records. Where the result of these tests is satisfactory, the absence of specific corroboration from solicitors would not necessarily justify a qualification of the auditors' report.

It remains clear, however, that the duty of qualification remains where, having regard to all the circumstances, the auditors are unable to satisfy themselves of the information required for the purposes of their audit – including pending litigation.

Wage Inflation = Economic Futility

THE past twelve months have seen an unprecedented rise in the number and size of wage and salary claims and in the actual rises of wages and salaries achieved. Basic hourly rates of wages in all industries and services rose by 9.8 per cent, and in manufacturing industry by 9.6 per cent between June 1969 and June 1970. At the latter date, both rates were more than double those at January 31st, 1956. The average annual rise between January 1956 and June 1970 was a little more than 5 per cent. These claims have been backed up by strikes or threats of strikes to the extent that days lost from this cause over this particular period of one year have been very much higher than annual averages over a long period. The increases obtained have been gained in spite of a high level of unemployment, a relatively low pressure of demand and almost negligible growth rates.

Not surprisingly, a number of economic arguments have been put forward to justify these inflated claims and awards. The two main ones are, first, that the standard of living of wage and salary earners is in need of improvement; second, higher wages and salaries, acting through increased consumer expenditure, will give a boost to the economy and so stimulate output. Consumer expenditure will be increased immediately, so the argument runs, and this will bring about an increase in investment in due course, in order to meet the higher demand from consumers.

How do these arguments stand up to the test of actual experience and to a more sophisticated economic analysis? Living standards are determined by what money wages will buy. It is of great significance that the retail price index rose by 5.9 per cent between June 1969 and June 1970. This compares with an annual average rise of 3 per cent over the 14 years from mid-1956 to mid-1970. These figures certainly give the impression that higher wages quickly make an impact on retail prices.

But this is not all. Some proportion of the higher earnings will have been siphoned off by taxation. This arises when higher earnings cause the recipient to pay tax for the first time, or increase the rate at which he pays tax. The arithmetic involved was presented in a table which appeared in Economic Review for February 1970 published by the National Institute of Economic and Social Research.

This table assumed that wages and salaries would increase by 10 per cent between the fourth quarter of 1969 and that of 1970. If this occurs, gross personal incomes will grow by only 8.4 per cent because other elements of income are either fixed or respond only with a long lag. Dividend income is of this kind. With progressive income tax rates, the increase in personal disposable income will be still less – 6.9 per cent in fact. The consumer price index can be expected to increase by 4.7 per cent as a result of this 10 per cent rise in wages and salaries, leaving little more than a 2 per cent increase in disposable income and one of about 2 per cent when the marginal increase in saving is taken into consideration.

The recipients of the 10 per cent, on an unchanged expenditure pattern would retain about 3½ per cent of it and spend about 3¼ per cent. The poor unfortunates who received no increase would find that the consumer price index has risen by 4½ per cent and the retail price index by almost 5 per cent. Consumer expenditure as a whole would rise by less than 2 per cent.

In other words, the recipients of the 10 per cent increase have achieved some increase in their living standards – possibly 3 per cent – at the cost of considerable hardship to their fellow citizens on fixed incomes.

The argument that the living standards of wage and salary earners are in need of improvement is, in fact, being met. Wages and salaries are a growing proportion of the national income. The stimulus given to demand from the hypothetical increase in consumer spending is likely to be quite marginal. In real terms, it was only 1 per cent higher in the first half of 1970 than it had been in the second half of 1969.

Even so, it is probable that expenditure on imports and holidays abroad is absorbing an ever-rising proportion of total consumer expenditure. From the point of the community as a whole, the 10 per cent increase could well have decreased Britain's international competitiveness and taken more than a fair share of imports. It is difficult, too, to put aside the suggestion that in Britain high earnings are being more and more used to finance absenteeism and strikes, thus restricting growth in industrial production.

What, then is the remedy for this situation, if indeed there is one? Tax cuts would increase incentives and step up the proportion of earnings spent on consumption. If these could be supplemented by an export-led or investment-induced boom, some progress towards a solution might well be made. Above all, a much faster rate of economic growth is absolutely indispensable, if industrial price rises are to be kept within bounds.

Current Affairs

Integration Cliff-hanger

THE hazards of poll forecasting have already been demonstrated this year, and when this issue of The Accountant went to press, the outcome of this week's crucial vote by members of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales on the future of the profession remained a matter of doubt and speculation. Following the publication of the President's letter in our columns last week, a further influx of proxy cards brought the total number so far received by the scrutineers, less than 24 hours before the poll was due to close, to approximately 32,000.

According to an Institute spokesman, this total had still to be adjusted in respect of an unknown number of members who might have changed their instructions after receiving the report of the special meeting on June 24th. It was also known to include over 7,000 proxies given in favour of Mr H. T. Nicholson, F.C.A., and Mr B. W. Sutherland, F.C.A., who have been active in opposing the scheme. There is accordingly a very real prospect of a close-run finish.

The present membership of the Institute is approximately 48,000 and to become effective the integration scheme requires the support of two-thirds of those who vote, whether by proxy or in person, tomorrow (Friday). Members have previously voted to proceed with the scheme by 5,937 votes to 5,744 on May 22nd, 1968 and by 12,268 to 6,255 on April 17th, 1969. On each of those occasions the relevant resolution required only a simple majority.

Stock Exchange Audits

STOCKBROKERS' accounts present a number of specialized problems and Rule 79A of the London Stock Exchange has several times been strengthened in recent years. The valiant attempts of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales to keep what was section P8 of their Members' Handbook up to date in this regard are now a matter of history.

The present rule effectually requires an audit of a member-firm's accounts to be carried out, and the auditors must report to the Council of the Stock Exchange, London, whether in their opinion the balance sheet shows a true and fair view. A statement recently issued by the Institute's Professional Standards Committee likens the auditors' responsibilities to those which arise under the Companies Acts, and recommends that any material curtailment of the scope of their examination should be the subject of a reservation or a disclaimer of opinion in their report.

Particular emphasis attaches to the margin of solvency revealed by the balance sheet. Stock Exchange practice requires such a margin to be maintained at all times, and auditors will therefore need to be vigilant towards the possible effect of window-dressing operations before and after the accounting date. The Institute statement recommends a careful examination of clients' accounts to ensure that material debit items are not masked by an overall credit balance, and also reminds auditors that their responsibility in regard to secured creditors' balances is 'onerous and specific'.

In addition to the Institute statement, accountants whose clientele includes Stock Exchange firms will require copies of Accounting Rule 79A and notes for guidance thereto, published by the Council of the Stock Exchange, London. The accounting implications of these notes have been discussed with and approved by the English Institute and will also be found of assistance when dealing with the accounts of members of other federated stock exchanges outside London.

Fact or Fiction?

AN article published in the Financial Times last week shows that the supply of commentators seeking to criticize the profession from what appears to be a position of misunderstanding is not yet exhausted. The latest is Mr Tony Rayman of the Bradford Management Centre, who perpetuates the now-familiar reference to auditors taking upon themselves the role of prophets in 'certifying' asset valuations, and attempts to segregate the responsibilities of auditors and directors by making the former responsible for the facts and the latter for the estimates.

Mr Rayman is on firm ground when he describes the process of production as being normally continuous, so that at any accounting date there are large amounts of 'input' at various stages of conversion to 'output'. Unfortunately he falls into early error by immediately describing 'all the assets in the conventional balance sheet' as outputs of the productive process – a definition which appears completely to overlook the hitherto recognized distinction between fixed and current assets – and claims that the incorporation of asset valuations into the accounts 'represents a departure from the objective recording of actual transactions'.

According to Mr Rayman, it then 'becomes impossible to distinguish between the results of actual events and the effects of accounting procedures'. His proposed solution for this state of affairs is a 'segregated system of funds' in which records of fact and assessments of value would be kept rigidly apart.

Alpha Again

IT was doubtless the failure of several insurance companies during the 1960s which inspired Part II of the Companies Act 1967. Practical experience of the Board of Trade's considerable powers under the Act is still limited, and for this reason the restriction order made last week against the Midland, Northern and Scottish Insurance Company in pursuance of section 68 (1) of the Act will have been noted with interest.

This company issues the 'Alpha' motor policy, and the present restriction order is the second to which it has been subject within the space of six months. The previous restriction was imposed on February 2nd and lifted on March 17th after additional capital had been raised. A statement issued by the company claimed a profit of £147,000 for the April to June quarter, and referred to a 'marginal' deficiency of £85,000 in net tangible assets at June 30th.

'Alpha' is not a member of the British Insurance Association, and is understood not to follow the general practice of the market in rating motor insurance risks. The present ban prohibits the company from underwriting new business and from accepting renewals or variations of existing policies, but does not apply to the settlement of claims arising under policies currently in force.

Econometrics Explained

THE recent history of planners' efforts to regulate the economy bestows few laurels on present standards of economic forecasting. On the other hand, some measure of both short- and long-term planning is necessary in the modern economy given governments' commitment to full employment. To this end one of the most useful techniques which has been evolved is model building, enthusiasm for which – like the number of variables – has increased with the development of the computer.

In a new study entitled Pitfalls in Economic Forecasting (IEA Research Monograph No. 23, 10s), Professor Erich W. Streissler, of the University of Vienna, examines the basis of modern economic prediction. He reminds his readers that 'econometrics' was once defined as 'predictions of the economic past' – a description as true as it is unkind. The simple fact is that the results from any economic model building and forecasting on the basis of regression techniques can be no better than the data on which they are based. Such data are not merely derived from past events, but may also suffer from various statistical shortcomings.

Professor Streissler does not decry the new technique; rather he is concerned with the failure to take adequate precautions in interpreting the results. For example, he observes that it would be valuable if econometricians would cross-check their results with those derived from models used in other countries, although he concedes international cross-checking to be both costly and dangerous. Nevertheless, econometrics is, on average, somewhat better than previous methods, which means, in the words of the Professor, that they are 'sometimes much better and sometimes much worse'. He recalls Sir Winston Churchill's comment on democracy that, while it was the worst possible form of government, he knew of none better. The same is true of econometrics.

The Institute of Economic Affairs has sponsored a most useful publication in this paper, though it is based more on foreign than on UK experience. In particular, it is a very useful exposition of the principles and problems of this new technique of economic planning, completely free of political overtones.

Lord Jack

THE award of a life peerage to Mr George Brown must be considered one of the best-leaked secrets of modern times. Other names in the recent Dissolution Honours List could perhaps have been predicted with less confidence.

Life peerages are conferred upon seven other ex-ministers in addition to Mr Brown. These include the Rt Hon. John Diamond, P.C., F.C.A., who was admitted to membership of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales in 1931, and who was Chief Secretary to the Treasury from 1964 until his electoral defeat at Gloucester this year.

Dissolution honours are traditionally in the gift of the outgoing Prime Minister, and if on this occasion the list has been a little more widely drawn than some commentators anticipated, at least none of our readers will begrudge Mr Diamond's elevation. His ability is recognised by his political opponents no less than his supporters, and it is welcome news that the profession's somewhat tenuous representation in the Lower House will be actively reinforced in another place.

The Irish Bank Dispute

THE four-month-old bank closure appears to have reached a deadlock. The committee of the Irish Bank Officials' Association has rejected the Labour Court's award because it offered no compensation for the lock-out period. It considers this action is vindicated by the Court's recommendation of substantial increases retrospective to December 1969, compared with the banks' insistence on retrospection only to July 1970. Another important reason is that those officials who failed to find alternative employment during the closure may be unable to afford to return at the cost of abandoning four months' salary.

The banks' Standing Committee said they would accept the Court's recommendation although it was 'certainly an inflationary one'. However, they remain adamant that there is 'not the slightest possibility' of compensation for the period of closure.

The Minister for Labour said in the Dail that he thought the Labour Court had come up with a fair set of proposals, bearing in mind that the banks could not have continued under restricted working and had no option but to close. He did not consider that there was a lock-out, and could not accept under any conditions the principle of payment for time on strike. The Prime Minister, in support, said that this philosophy could not be introduced into the country's industrial relations code, and described it as a crazy concept.

Meanwhile, the general public is finding money becoming more and more scarce. The obliging grocer or chemist now asks for a day's prior notice before he can arrange to cash a £20 cheque in many towns, and the cinemas and supermarkets expect a 2 to 3 per cent discount for cashing wages cheques. Small cheques with upwards of ten endorsements are in circulation in country areas.

THIS IS MY LIFE

Applied Psychology

by An Industrious Accountant

THE managing director leaned forward in his chair and scrutinized closely the organization chart which showed our company manpower, department by department, with the lines of authority dotted in meticulously. His gaze lingered on the coloured boxes illustrating Prinny's henchmen in the Personnel Department, and he asked that worthy how his latest committee was acquitting itself.

There was an ominous pause. Then Prinny answered bluffly that it was doing fine – doing a great job, in fact, with results really exceeding all expectations. This avowal fell into another silence, noticeably devoid of corroborative enthusiasm, so he followed up rather lamely that one didn't expect immediate demonstrable benefits, of course. It was a long-term project naturally . . .

Actually the committee had achieved a dubious notoriety already. It originated after Prinny returned enthused from some seminar on managerial career development and, after announcing our company's lamentable lack of factual evidence of dynamic entrepreneurial talent, established this group to remedy the defects. It was headed by his most recent recruit, a graduate in psychology, and he co-opted various earnest and long-winded representatives from the other departments.

As far as Accounts was concerned, I had pointed out that our annual appraisals already included agreed plans for rotational and extra-mural training for our own people. Prinny hammered back the enormity of the absence of recorded follow-up procedures, which must in his opinion be frustrating in the extreme, and claimed that this function must in future be exercised by his own department.

Accounts staff, be it said, are rarely frustrated. What happens is that the more ambitious middle-level types naturally enough leave to climb ladders elsewhere, so our own internal promotions are more often forced upon us than foreseen; by and large, however, we run accordingly to plan.

My opposite numbers in charge of other departments spoke in similar vein, but Prinny pulled rank, bulldozing his way through our remonstrances, and his committee got into action. It held numerous meetings, circulated sheaves of recommendations padded with quotes from hitherto unknown eggheads, and then commenced a series of interviews. By this time it had acquired another assistant, an extra typist and a tape-recorder, and had issued questionnaires bristling with such ambiguous subsections as 'Is he a self-starter . . . envious of his subordinates' successes . . . a good leader . . . cool in emergencies?'

The committee members went to conferences and courses and drove us mad by asking that key men be released at short notice for training in personality appreciation and sensitivity T-groups. Scotty had an unpleasant interlude with them when he insisted that he must be present at any talk on future promotional prospects with his immediate assistants. They had a battle royal with Costs, who's short-tempered under pressure, when they asked him if he had any complaints about the non-implementation of his planned rotation to internal audit. He replied that he kept his complaints, if he had any, between himself and his boss and saw no point in dragging outsiders into the act. The psychological character sounded off snootily in complicated seven-syllabic jargon, so Costs cut him down to size with a four-letter exhortation and the meeting of twin-souls disintegrated . . .

The MD coughed gently and suggested to Prinny that possibly we might dissolve the committee – temporarily, of course – and assign its members to some more obviously productive work until further notice.

International Financial Reporting

by I. McKINNELEY, B.A., F.C.A., A.C.W.A.

In this comparative study of accounting practices, the author, who is O.E.C.D. Visiting Professor in Accounting at the Middle East Technical University of Ankara, puts the case for a more uniform standard of international financial reporting.

OVER the past 25 years, international business activity has been operating on an ever-growing scale and it is no longer a curiosity to find companies with a majority of their total assets located in countries other than those of their respective incorporations, and with a significant portion of their net profits being derived from overseas sources. These international or multinational business enterprises are heavily dependent on financial and accounting information and reports from overseas subsidiaries in order to plan future policy and action in the international field.

Nature of financial statements

Internationally, the financial statements in most common usage are the balance sheet and profit and loss account. The balance sheet is often referred to as 'position statement', 'financial condition statement', 'statement of financial position', 'summary of assets and liabilities'. The profit and loss account has numerous different descriptions such as 'income statement', 'statement of operating results', 'income and expense account', 'earnings statement' and 'revenue account', and the information provided therein varies considerably. In Britain and the developing countries of the Commonwealth the description 'profit and loss account' is firmly entrenched, but Australia and Canada tend to follow the USA description 'income statement'.

Historically, the balance sheet has been the primary financial statement, largely due to the importance of financial liquidity and creditor protection, and it is the only financial statement required to be reported by law in many developing Commonwealth countries, and the countries of South America. Several Western European countries, including Switzerland, still give paramount importance to the balance sheet. Even where it is customary to provide a profit and loss account, this often shows an undesirable lack of information by comparison with the balance sheet, illustrating the greater regard for the latter.

In those countries more highly developed industrially, and with a more sophisticated management élite and a more active investing public, it is fair to state that attention has switched to the profit and loss account with the balance sheet seen as a huge footnote to a series of successive income statements. W. J. Graham writes:

'Most of the significant controversial issues in financial reporting relate primarily to the measurement of income . . . This is not to say that the balance sheet – the statement of financial position – is not an important report. It is only to say that most of the amounts on the balance sheet are residual figures, that they are the resultants of decisions which have been made from the point of view of the income statement.'¹

This view has over the years found greatest recognition in the USA, stemming from the improvements in financial reporting which took place from the early 1930s. Britain has gradually moved in this direction as has Australian professional opinion, but this is not a uniform situation internationally.

Form and design of financial statements

Terminology within the statements tends to be confusing. The term depreciation in French statements is liberally used to mean a provision for a loss. Hence, French statements 'depreciate' debtors, and stocks are 'depreciated' if the market value is lower than cost. The terms reserve and provision have restricted meanings in Britain and the Commonwealth, but have no comparable restriction in United States practice, although it appears in AICPA literature. Internationally, the term provision is used to describe estimated or accrued liabilities, indefinitely deferred liabilities, appropriations of business earnings, and period charges in income statements.

Classification problems show for example that Germany and Sweden regard accumulated depreciation as a liability account, whilst some countries classify 'provisions' as part of the equity. The United States and growing British practice of the non-classification of retained profits differs greatly from the European practice of classification of retained profits. There is also the general acceptance on the Continent that many of the reserves created can be utilized to 'smooth out' large fluctuations in the annual net income by re-appropriation.

As regards the presentation of financial data, whilst more countries are accepting the narrative form of balance sheet, this is not so with the presentation of the profit and loss statement, where the old and awkward debit and credit account form is still found, with the consequent lack of clarity in showing the net operating profit for the period.

Two types of financial statements are generally prepared on the international scene:

- (1) statements prepared in accordance with legislation or administrative rules; and
- (2) statements prepared on the basis of generally accepted accounting principles or 'accounting practices' or simply 'sound business practices'.

Financial statements prepared under (1) are filed with a government department or public body. British financial reporting tends to fall between (1) and (2) because of the postulate 'true and fair' on the state of the financial statements, and the compliance with the requirements of Companies Acts, otherwise statutory financial statements make no pretence at being 'fair' or relevant to best business practice. These statements, therefore, are generally only as good or as comprehensive as the applicable legislation, and if the legislation is allowed to become outdated and obsolete, the complying financial statements have no real significance.

Financial statements prepared under (2) are found particularly in the United States, Canada and the Netherlands, and are prepared in accordance with what has evolved as an acceptable standard of accounting practice in the respective country. Under these circumstances the professional bodies of accountants put out statements or opinions on accounting principles and problem areas, supplemented by general business opinion, and the requirements of the major stock exchanges and securities commissions.

Lack of international standards

An international problem arises in that internationally accepted accounting principles do not exist at present. The difficulty is one of identifying the accepted practice of one country as used, in contrast to the possibly different accepted practices of another country, and discovering and assessing these differences. The United States probably leads other countries in the proliferation of accounting recommendations and opinions, and in the general standards of disclosure carefully supervised by the Securities and Exchange Commission. However, despite the progress made in the United States over the past 40 years in the standards of financial reporting, there appears to be considerable criticism there on many of the principles underlying present accounting practice.²

In 1959 there was set up by the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants an Accounting Principles Board, which is the opinion-making body for the profession and has issued 15 opinions on accounting principles in the past ten years. Nevertheless, it has been expressed in recent writings that the Board must apply more thought and research to clarify accounting fundamentals, and should establish uniform accounting principles on a sound and authoritative basis in order to have the fairest presentation of financial information to interested parties. Despite these alleged deficiencies, United States information presentation is becoming accepted, particularly in South America, to some extent in Europe, and, of course, in the United Kingdom.

There is a third area of financial reporting, particularly found on the Continent, which whilst not for publication to the shareholders and the general public is established to satisfy the requirements of the applicable tax laws. A situation therefore arises where more than one set of financial statements is prepared for a given company at a given date, each set serving a distinctly different purpose. This may be considered desirable in minimizing the influence of the taxation rules upon general accounting practices.

Supplementary information and additional disclosure

There has been considerable controversy over the past ten years as to what should be included in the financial statements produced, and what should be given as supplementary information. It has been suggested that the traditional balance sheet and income statement, whilst retaining a significant position in financial reporting, will become submerged by funds statements, line-of-business reporting, and the publication of budgets and operating statistics.³

In the United States, it has been customary for many years to show comparative statements or summaries of financial information for periods of up to ten years or more. This trend reporting is now seen more in British supplementary information, including turnover statistics. However, the reporting of sales revenue is not prevalent international practice, and in Australia recently there has been sharp criticism of the lack of this and other information.

In Sweden, company legislation requires detailed annual reporting of each company's investments in other companies. There is a general public highlighting of this inter-company investing, strongly connected and influenced by the financial swindles which occurred in Sweden in the early 1940s.

In the developing countries of the Commonwealth little use appears to be made of explanatory notes or to provide more detailed information about items appearing in the statements, although recent developments in company legislation in some of the countries will lead to greater information.

In 1963, the Accounting Principles Board of the AICPA issued its Opinion No. 3 on the employment of the statement of sources and applications of funds as a supplementary financial statement. This was endorsed by the New York Stock Exchange, and is now generally regarded as an integral part of financial reporting by the majority of United States companies. There is little doubt that this funds statement improves the information content of sets of financial statements, but companies in Britain have been very slow to provide this information in annual reporting.

Because of escalating inflation in Brazil in the last decade, financial statements prepared there tend to be adjusted for price level, or supplementary statements are issued to show the effect of rapid price increases.

In Germany, where notes to financial statements have been a rarity, one finds the tendency to show all movements in fixed asset accounts inserted in the balance sheet. New assets purchased, disposals of used assets, and depreciation provisions are shown, and reconciled in detail within the framework of the balance sheet. In France and Switzerland two balance sheets are prepared, showing the position before the proposed allocation of net income and the position thereafter.

There is a tendency, particularly in Britain and South America, for some supplementary information to appear 'away' from the basic financial statements, usually in the report of the directors (British Companies Act 1967) and in the chairman's address to the shareholders.

Presentation of consolidated statements

On the international scene there is a steadily growing usage of consolidated statement reporting, and the majority of multi-national and internationally involved companies present some form of consolidated reports. However, only a few countries legally require the preparation of consolidated statements.

As is well known to British accountants it is customary here to submit the holding company's accounts, and then to submit the subsidiary companies' operations in the form of consolidated accounts; this has much support in the Commonwealth, and most Continental countries. In North America the consolidated statements are regarded as paramount, and separate holding and subsidiary companies' statements are less common. The American influence prevails in Japan and latterly Germany under recent company legislation.⁴

As is well known, there is considerable controversy surrounding consolidated statements, and their value. A recent article in *The Australian Accountant*⁵ argues that the separate trading results of subsidiaries should be disclosed and 'that consolidated statements are only a general guide to what the position might have been if the organization had traded as one entity. The assets of one profitable undertaking are not necessarily available to pay the debts of another company in the group'. Manuel Cohen, late chairman of the US Securities and Exchange Commission, has stated: 'It is no longer enough for the investing public to know the overall results in consolidated form. If investors are to make meaningful decisions, they must also know the respective contributions of the various categories to the consolidated income figures.'

In US practice the need for consolidation arises when there exists majority management control and a sufficient degree of homogeneity in the business functions. This is somewhat similar to the British interpretation, provided one takes into account the alternative requirement of a majority equity share capital holding. On the Continent and elsewhere the criterion appears as one of equity control and voting rights, and in some countries a large holding of the voting stock, but substantially less than the British requirement, can bring with it an obligation for consolidation.

Audit reports and standards

The reliability of financial information on the international scene is even more consequential than on the domestic scene, and great importance is attached to independent auditing opinion internationally, provided the auditor has the recognized status in his own country to offer such opinion. It is essential in this respect to establish the professional status of the auditor, and then to evaluate the standards and procedures used in the rendering of opinions. Fortunately, auditing standards are more consistent than accounting standards throughout the international scene, as most developed economies insist on high professional standards, with a similar emphasis in many developing nations. Audit procedures vary somewhat, but still less than accounting procedures.

Audit reporting as well as professional conduct is prescribed by law in some countries, by the professional institutes in others, and little or no prescription in certain countries. Auditing standards usually require the rendering of a report, which can differ considerably from country to country.

The well-known British audit report finds increasing acceptance throughout the Commonwealth with the reference to 'true and fair view' and legislative requirements. Swedish reports tend to ignore reference to audit standards, or the fairness of financial statements, but emphasize the efficiency of the company's administration. German reports are almost exclusively limited to legal requirements, and the audit report in The Netherlands is to be noted for its brevity, but operating within the establishment of well-known professional standards. North American reports, usually fairly brief, emphasize conformity to generally accepted accounting principles and generally accepted auditing standards, as laid down by the AICPA.

International co-operation and suggested development programme

It is obvious from this review of international reporting that presently no clear international standards of accounting exist, and that these differences, particularly in the light of present-day international business and financial and merger expansion, indicate the need for development in the following main areas:

- (1) International meetings. There are four well-known conferences operating internationally, namely:
 - (a) The International Congress of Accountants;
 - (b) Union Européenne des Experts Comptables, Economiques et Financiers (UEC);
 - (c) Inter-American Accounting Conference;
 - (d) Conference of Asian and Pacific Accountants.
 These conferences have created a definite place for themselves in international accounting affairs, and we must hope that working committees will be established to continue to develop thoughts and ideas between conferences.
- (2) Substantial educational developments, leading to the creation of the subject 'international accounting', as we have international laws and international politics. To be taken at University and professional level.
- (3) Greater facilities for accounting research to give serious attention to international dimensions in accounting. The professional institutes and international enterprises should co-operate with universities to develop programmes in this direction.
- (4) Co-operation of international professional firms and international business enterprises, leading to the development of an international accounting outlook.

Value Added Tax-II

by T. A. KENNEDY, B.A.

4. Social and administrative problems

THERE remain two basic problems which would arise with the introduction of a VAT and which have been the source of concern. First, there are the social effects of an increase in the scope of indirect taxation on the lower income groups. Second, there are the fears that the administration of the tax would be costly and cumbersome.

4.2. There is no doubt that a major switch from direct to indirect taxation, in which the latter fell on a wide range of presently low taxed or untaxed goods and services, would have a regressive effect. There are two ways in which this could be mitigated, firstly, by selective exemptions (e.g., of food) and the use of higher rates on luxury goods to make good the revenue, and secondly, by the use of social benefits or the adjustment of other taxes (both of which of course would be a charge on the Revenue). On the basis of the best calculations which it has been possible to make, and on the assumption that food is untaxed, then it appears that in fact the regressive effect of a VAT, at the kind of rates suggested above, would be very small. This reinforces the point that individual taxes should not, in this respect, be judged in isolation but have to be seen in the context of taxes and benefits as a whole, and the way in which they might disturb the existing fiscal balance and its relation to desired social objectives would be disturbed.

4.3. The second major problem is that of administration. There are undoubtedly very real complexities here which would result from the large number of taxpayers who would be involved, from the probable frequency of payments, and from the need for all transactions to be documented (in order that credits and liabilities may be assessed).

4.4. It has been estimated that up to about two million traders might be brought into the tax net. Clearly this is very large compared with the numbers at present paying purchase tax (i.e., about 65,000), but not as compared with those paying SET or income tax. This number, too, could no doubt be reduced by the exemption of small firms and perhaps other special categories, but there would still no doubt be an administrative problem if these were to be separately taxed in other ways. The major difficulties and burdens would arise not so much in the field of the collection of the tax, which can be mechanized, but rather in the area of verification and inspection where even if the coverage could be reduced to one million traders there would need to be a very large additional inspectorate if adequate scrutiny of accounts was to be undertaken. (The present rate of inspection with purchase tax is about thrice yearly.)

4.5. There are, of course, ways of overcoming many of these problems – at a price. Inspections could be random rather than regular in the hope that uncertainty and appropriately high penalties would impose the necessary disciplines and conformity with the rules. Also the general way in which the tax was conceived and legislated for could make considerable differences: multiple rates and many and refined exemptions are a sure way to add to the costs of administration; if the frequency of inspection is reduced some increase in the revenue loss due to tax evasion could arise, and a positive decision might need to be taken on what level of evasion could be regarded as socially tolerable and economically worth while. Perhaps most important of all, however, is the possibility that our tax administration might be re-examined in the light of present and future requirements. The introduction of a tax collected on the basis of business turnover but falling on consumption like an expenditure tax could provide a good opportunity for reviewing the historical and institutional factors which have resulted in dividing responsibility for tax collection between two or more Revenue departments.

5. The future

5.1. The greater part of the argument and discussion about VAT in this country has, up to now, taken place within either a semi-academic or an almost polemically political context. However, as has been noted earlier, the likelihood is that if we become members of the EEC we shall be required to adopt the VAT system broadly in the form in which it operates at present. In such an event the theological and polemical issues, and the question of 'Should we or shouldn't we?' will disappear and be replaced by the questions of 'How and in what form?'

5.2. In a fully integrated economic community a common system (and probably common rates) of taxation are obviously required, especially on goods traded between the member countries. The adoption of the VAT system by the EEC was an attempt to move towards this objective in a manner which would take account of the individual countries' existing tax systems. The council of the EEC adopted the 'common system of tax on value added' in February 1967, and the tax was supposed to have been fully implemented by January 1st, 1970. However, Belgium and Italy has asked for more time to make the necessary arrangements so that as things stand within the Community only Germany, France and the Netherlands have the system in operation. (The three Scandinavian countries have also adopted it.) However, the EEC system is not only at present incomplete, but there are very wide differences in the tax rates, coverage and general administrative practices in the three countries where it is in force.

5.3. The first and second directives of the EEC council of April 11th, 1967, define the broad outlines of the community legislation fairly rigorously, and it would clearly need to be taken as the starting-point and basic framework of any legislation introduced into the UK.

5.4. Since the NEDO report on VAT was published last year many inquiries have been received from firms and organizations asking how the tax might be applied to them, and whether this, that or the other type of transaction would be exempted. It has usually been impossible to answer such questions because so much would depend on the content and coverage of the legislation which, in turn, would incorporate many political and social decisions as well as economic or administrative considerations. There are one or two broad principles, however, which provide a sufficiently clear guide for most purposes and against which most situations can be tested. These may be conveniently summed up in the following extracts from the EEC directives:

- (a) 'On each transaction, the tax on value added, calculated on the price of the good or service at the rate applicable to such good or service, is to be payable after deduction of the amount of the tax on value added which has directly affected the cost of the various components of the price.'

(First Directive, Article 2)

- (b) 'The following are to be subject to the tax on value added:

- (a) deliveries of goods and the rendering of services, effected for a consideration within the country by a taxable person;
(b) importations of goods.'

(Second Directive, Article 2)

- (c) 'The term "delivery of a good" is to be understood as meaning the transfer of the power to dispose of a tangible asset . . . (including) the actual handing over of a good pursuant to a contract which provides for the rental . . . or for the instalment rate of a good, in both cases subject to a clause that the ownership is to be acquired not later than the payment of the last instalment.'

(Second Directive, Article 5)

- (d) 'The following are to be exempt from the tax . . .

- (a) deliveries of goods dispatched or transported outside the territory . . . ;
(b) the rendering of services relating to goods referred to in (a) or to goods in transit.'

(Second Directive, Article 10)

- (e) 'In so far as the goods and services are used for the requirements of his undertaking the taxable person is authorized to deduct from the tax for which he is liable:

- (a) the tax on value added for which he is invoiced in respect of the goods delivered to him and in respect of the services rendered to him;
(b) the tax on value added paid in respect of imported goods . . . ;'

(Second Directive, Article 11)

- (f) 'Every taxable person must maintain a sufficiently detailed book-keeping system so as to permit the application of the tax on value added and the control thereof by the tax administration.'

- (g) 'Every taxable person must deliver an invoice in respect of the delivery of goods to and the rendering of services for another taxable person.'

- (h) 'Every taxable person must file a declaration each month indicating in respect of transactions engaged in during the previous month all the information necessary for the computation of them and the deductions to be taken . . . '

(Second Directive, Article 12)

5.5. The above summary is, of course, by no means complete or comprehensive but it provides, perhaps, a pointer to some of the main considerations which would need to be taken into account in the framing of national legislation: for example, the need to define taxable goods and services more closely (for instance, to deal with second-hand goods or financial services), or the definition of 'within the country', and whether, for example, the buying and selling of commodities overseas by UK resident firms would count as a taxable transaction. At the end of the day the legislation would probably look depressingly like most other tax law.

5.6. How might the introduction of a VAT be brought about in practice? It would clearly be necessary to proceed in stages rather than in a single step, because of the abrupt changes in price relativities which would probably be involved, and also because a considerable period of preparation would be required to set up the new administrative arrangements. In several of the European countries the VAT was introduced into a tax system which already contained broadly-based turnover taxes in which both wide coverage and a large number of taxpayers were characteristic features. The only similar ad valorem tax on consumption which we have in the UK is the single stage, multi-rate, highly selective, purchase tax.

5.7. For a VAT to be grafted on to our present system at least five basic stages in the evolution could be required. First, the number of rates of purchase tax - at present four, ranging from 13½ per cent to 55 per cent - would need to be reduced and brought to about the levels thought appropriate for the basic rates of VAT. Second, the coverage of the tax would need to be extended to all except specifically exempted goods.¹ Third, a similar or equivalent tax would have to be applied to services, probably initially to identifiable consumer services only. Up to this point there would be no system of fractional payments, and also the somewhat anomalous situation that retailers of goods would not be liable to tax while retailers of services would be. A fourth step would be to ensure that the problem of spillover into costs, arising from purchases of the much more widely taxed range of goods was avoided by a system of tax credits compatible with a fully fledged VAT system later on. The fifth stage would be to extend the arrangements backwards in the system to the earlier stages of production and distribution, and forwards so as to include value added in all retailing. Even when all these stages had been gone through there would still be many differences from a fully integrated VAT system and many of the joints between the new and the old would be evident and no doubt abrasive. Nevertheless, the system would be in a form in which the final steps to produce consolidated legislation could be taken, although the whole process would probably have required a number of years to complete.

6. Conclusion

6.1. The paper so far has sketched very broadly the principles on which a VAT operates, and some of the quantitative and administrative implications of its possible adoption in the UK. This much is relatively straightforward; what is more difficult and fundamentally more important is to form a view on half a dozen or so basic questions of national economic and industrial policy.

- (a) How big a part would we wish a VAT to play in our Speed is often a vital factor in shrewd money management.

Delays in buying—or selling—can result in losses.

That's why the investment system adopted by The Eight Men from Edinburgh gives each portfolio manager freedom to act on his own initiative. No time is wasted waiting for committees to convene. He simply picks up the 'phone and issues the necessary instructions.

This should be reassuring to investors in CRESCENT INTERNATIONAL FUND and CRESCENT INCOME FUND. Investments for these two relatively new Unit Trusts launched by Edinburgh Securities—like those of certain other Funds whose combined value is in the region of £50 million—are managed by The Eight Men from Edinburgh.

Each Fund is the responsibility of an individual portfolio manager who, being in regular daily contact with other members of the team, works in an atmosphere calculated to stimulate a steady exchange of ideas and a pooling of market information.

Once a week all Eight Men meet to discuss home and overseas market conditions, trends and policy matters on a formal basis. The occasion provides a forum at which a different manager every week is called on to justify his portfolio—and defend his independent decisions—before the expert examination of his colleagues. The assessment and re-evaluation of investments, therefore, is guaranteed by this constant critical supervision.

PREPARING FOR DECIMALS

Internal Administration, Pricing and Costing

FAILURE to appreciate that decimalization affects everyone, and takes place on February 15th, 1971, could lead to serious problems, loss of customers' goodwill, and possibly a substantial fall in turnover. This is the theme of the latest decimalization booklet to be issued by The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants, from which the following extracts are reproduced.¹ Previous booklets in this series have dealt with decimalization as it affects long-term contracts, cash and payroll, conversion of office machinery, and the accountant in practice.

Internal administration

The first step on the part of management is to appoint a decimalization officer to study the impact of the change-over. He should be an experienced officer of the organization, familiar with all aspects of its activities. The decimalization officer should be responsible to a high level of management.

The duties of the decimalization officer may be summarized as follows:

- (i) to study and acquaint himself thoroughly with the British decimal currency system;
- (ii) to undertake a complete appraisal of the manner in which decimalization affects every aspect of the business;
- (iii) to recommend and obtain policy decisions to enable line management to formulate detailed plans for the change-over;
- (iv) to give all necessary assistance to line management in formulating and implementing those plans;
- (v) to work out a general scheme of training in collaboration with line management and help with its implementation;

- (vi) to maintain liaison with all outside bodies by whom the business is affected.

Certain basic decisions will have to be made in most businesses and it is the duty of the decimalization officer to recommend what these should be after a full investigation and detailed consultation with those affected, for example:

- (i) the extent to which the business will be involved in using the new $\frac{1}{2}p$;
- (ii) the system or systems used in rounding off amounts;
- (iii) the extent to which fractional amounts will be used involving three or more decimal places of a £;
- (iv) laying down standard modes of communication in writing and speech;
- (v) the date or dates when the business or individual departments will commence decimal working;
- (vi) consideration of the extent of any dual currency records which may be required and plans for implementation.

Office machines

The type of machinery on which a decision is required as to modification or replacement is divisible into three main categories:

- (i) office machinery, including computers;
- (ii) machinery concerned with products and services, such as vending machines of all types, including petrol pumps, shop scales, and slot machines;
- (iii) machinery concerned with manufacture and packaging.

Changes in the last type of machine will result from a decision to offer different packs or even different products as the results of a change in price structure particularly of low cost goods.

At departmental level, staff will need to be trained in the particular skill relevant to their job. This is particularly the case with cashiers and shop assistants. It also applies to a whole range of other jobs where money is not necessarily handled but recorded. It is for the departmental manager to specify the nature of these changes within the general framework laid down by management through the decimalization officer.

Consideration should be given to the timing of the training programme. In order to maintain goodwill the decimalization officer must ensure that the firm's policy on decimalization is explained well in advance to customers, suppliers, and employees.

It is important also to be in close touch with bankers and to know precisely what the requirement of the business will be during the 'closed' period from February 11th, 1971, to the morning of February 15th, 1971, making arrangements in advance for any special services that will be required.

Pricing

In amounts up to 1s, only 6d is capable of exact conversion into decimal money. The Government has therefore introduced a shoppers' table based on new $\frac{1}{2}p$ units. The table is so designed that there are an equal number of old pence to be rounded up as well as down.

The following extract from the Government White Paper entitled Decimal Currency: The Change-over puts the official point of view on price adjustment:

"The change-over to a decimal currency will lead inescapably to adjustments in the price structure of some goods and services, but the Decimal Currency Board and the Government are satisfied that decimalization need lead to no overall increase in price levels. It is recognized that the use of the new $\frac{1}{2}p$ would not be practicable (in the conversion of retail prices) where its application would lead to unacceptable losses or unjustified increases in the sale of low price goods or services: or where it would eliminate small steps or distort relationships in price or tariff structures. Where departure from the table is unavoidable, it may often be possible to balance increases or decreases in price by changes in other elements relating to the price such as distance, time or quantity, or by compensating changes elsewhere."

Consistency and uniformity in the expression of amounts in decimal currency should reduce queries and help to smooth the transition from one system to another, e.g.:

- (i) where the amount is a whole number of £s this should be expressed as follows: £192;
- (ii) where the amount is a whole number of new pence there are two approved modes of expression, e.g., 45p or £0.45. The latter mode expresses the pence in terms of £s and is more suitable for office use than in the marking of prices;
- (iii) where the amount involves both £s and new pence it should be expressed as £45.09. Note carefully that there are always two figures after the decimal point. £45.9 is an incorrect method of expressing £45 and 9 new pence;
- (iv) if a new $\frac{1}{2}p$ is involved this should be expressed as a vulgar fraction, thus: 10 $\frac{1}{2}p$; £45.92 $\frac{1}{2}$.

It is hoped in official circles that decimalization will see the end of the guinea as a unit of price. A guinea converts to £1.05 exactly, but the expression 'guinea' is unlikely to be applied to the amount in this unfamiliar form.

In conversation or on the telephone and when dictating letters there should be no ambiguity in conveying one's meaning. The Decimal Currency Board has this to say about oral expression:

"In speaking of decimal amounts, various methods will no doubt be used. If abbreviation goes too far it can be confusing. "Two seventy-five" is ambiguous. It is better to get into the habit of using the word "pound". Thus, "two pounds seventy-five", and "ninety-three pounds fifty-two".

"During the change-over period the addition of the words "new pence" may sometimes be permissible. The difficulty during the change-over is that without these words the expression of any number of new pence below 20 could be mistaken for £sd currency. For example, at present "six pounds seventeen" means six pounds seventeen shillings."

Costing

A change in the price of goods, services, or packaging being offered at retail outlets will involve alteration to profit margins and it may be necessary to modify the product or in some way modify the operations involved in marketing the product or in supplying the service. In order to do this a review of the costs involved will be essential.

The process of costing is thus a part of the problem of decimalizing prices. Accurate and detailed costing can help to ensure profit margins are maintained. The findings from such an exercise will govern the more profound changes which are necessary, and will indicate those areas where economies can be effected. It will also determine the sizes and quantities of those products which have to be modified.

Some organizations, especially those operating standard costing systems, work in decimals of either pence, shillings or £s for internal costing purposes, for example:

- (i) standard labour grade schedules expressed in decimals of 1s per minute;
- (ii) the calculation of operation costs based on standard minutes.

This is a much quicker operation than using hourly rates for each labour operation costing calculation, which normally requires a conversion to pence or decimals of 1s per minute on each occasion.

Many components are of such small value that the only satisfactory method of recording a significant cost is either by decimals of 1d or 1s or in some instances as a rate per 100, 1,000, or other convenient quantity. In either case the use of decimals should be advantageous.

Where raw materials are purchased on varying bases, considerable calculation is necessary to convert the rates to an amount per pound to coincide with the weight of material required per component or batch of components. When these rates are expressed in decimals of a £ much work should be eliminated. The pricing of material issue requisitions in decimal form will also assist the calculation of the value of the issue for subsequent costing purposes.

The calculation of wages on a time attended basis as a rate per hour is facilitated if the hourly rates are decimalized. For example, an hourly rate of 10s 2d would be shown as 51p.

It is not envisaged that overhead apportionment to cost centres will be greatly affected by decimalization, as the totals are normally rounded off to the nearest £.

It is frequently helpful to be able to compare past, current, and projected costs. It may therefore be advisable during 1970 to provide dual notation to bridge the transition from £sd to decimal and provide continuity so that 1969 can be compared, at least in total, on a similar basis with 1970 and in due course with 1971.

Partners or Company Promoters?

Ian S. Blackshaw, a solicitor and co-author of the 'Oyez' Practice Notes handbook on 'Partnership', examines the position of company promoters in a particular case.

It is often important, in practice, to determine whether or not a partnership exists. There are a variety of reasons for this – for example, tax assessment and general liability in contract or tort.

Section 1 (1) of the Partnership Act 1890 (referred to here as 'the 1890 Act') defines partnership as 'the relation which subsists between persons carrying on a business in common with a view of profit'. Section 45 of the 1890 Act defines the expression 'business' as including every trade, occupation or profession. The question as to whether or not the partnership relationship subsists in any given case is largely a question of evidence. Such a question arose in the recent – and important – Court of Appeal case of Keith Spicer Ltd v. Mansell ([1970] 1 All ER 462).

Facts in Spicer's case

The defendant and a certain Mr Bishop agreed to go into business together and form a limited liability company to run the defendant's restaurant. Before the company had in fact been formed, Bishop ordered certain goods from the plaintiffs, such goods being intended for the use of the company. The defendant and Bishop also opened a banking account in the name of the projected company omitting, however, the word 'Limited'.

The goods were duly delivered, but unhappily never paid for. Bishop subsequently became insolvent and the plaintiffs sued the defendant, claiming that he was liable for the cost of the goods as Bishop's partner under section 5 of the 1890 Act. The County Court judge held that there was no partnership, and the plaintiffs appealed.

The decision on appeal

The Court of Appeal (Harman, Edmund Davies and Widgery, LJJ) unanimously upheld the County Court judge's decision and dismissed the appeal on the ground that the defendant and Bishop were merely working together to form a company and were not, at least on the evidence, partners.

Various points which emerge from the three judgments are now considered. As to the ordering of the goods, Harman, LJ, stated:

'They [the defendant and Bishop] came to the conclusion that they would do certain things preparatory to the formation of the company so that the company could carry on business at once when it was formed, and one of the things that they did, or that Mr Bishop did, was to order these goods.'

The learned judge went on to consider whether or not the intention was to use the goods by the defendant and Bishop as partners or by the company when formed and observed:

'I have no doubt that a good deal of loose thinking went on, but we know that everything was done with a view to the company carrying on business. It was all, I think, preparatory to that event, and the question is whether that involves in itself a partnership . . . were Mr Bishop and the defendant carrying on a business?'

The judge came to the conclusion that there was no evidence of any business. He considered that the opening of the banking account was in the same category as the ordering of the goods – that is, an act preparatory to the carrying on of the restaurant business by the company. He put the matter in these terms:

' . . . I do not think that there is enough in the act of going to the bank and opening an account in the name without the word "Limited" to show that they were then as such carrying on business in partnership'.

In the course of his concurring judgment, Edmund Davies, LJ, made the points that the burden of establishing the existence of a partnership was on the plaintiffs, and that not every transaction between two people preparatory to the formation of a company is sufficient to make them partners.

Widgery, LJ, also delivered a concurring judgment in the course of which he observed:

'All the transactions as far as I can see were transactions which might perfectly well have been preparatory to the formation of the company, and accordingly, whatever the truth of the matter might have been if it had been more fully investigated in the evidence, there is in my judgment no material here on which we can say that the learned County Court judge erred.'

Conclusions

The ruling in Spicer's case will, it is submitted, be equally well received by company promoters and their advisers. Its practical implications are self-evident. However, it would be imprudent to read too much into the case because – as in many partnership cases – the decision rests entirely on its own peculiar facts or evidence.

The basis of the decision appears to have been the lack or paucity of evidence of the carrying on of any business. The outcome might well have been otherwise had the parties actually been engaged in trading activities of some kind or another, in anticipation of the intended company being duly incorporated. In other words, on other facts, company promoters may legally be partners, and therefore subject to the provisions of the 1890 Act.

Solicitors' Representation Letters

The Ascertainment and Confirmation of Contingent Liabilities Arising from Pending Legal Matters

The Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales has issued the following statement for the guidance of members. It has been prepared after discussions with the Council of the Law Society and consideration of the statement published by it entitled 'Information by solicitors for company audit purposes', copies of which are available from the Institute.

IT is the duty of directors to ensure that proper account is taken of all liabilities, including contingent liabilities, in the preparation of company financial statements. From the audit viewpoint, pending law suits and other actions against the company may present problems both of ascertainment and appraisal.

2. The following audit procedures are suggested for the verification of the existence of such claims though they will not necessarily provide the auditor with adequate information of the likely amounts for which the company may ultimately be responsible:

- (a) Reviewing the client's system of recording claims and the procedure for bringing these to the attention of the management or Board.
- (b) Discussing the arrangements for instructing solicitors with the official(s) responsible for legal matters (for example the head of the legal department (if any) or the company secretary).
- (c) Examining the minutes of the Board of directors and/or executive or other relevant committee for references to, or indications of, possible claims.
- (d) Examining bills rendered by solicitors and correspondence with them, in which connection the solicitors should be requested to furnish bills or estimates of charges to date, or to confirm that they have no unbilled charges.
- (e) Obtaining a list of matters referred to solicitors from the appropriate director or official with estimates of the possible ultimate liabilities.
- (f) Obtaining a written assurance from the appropriate director or official that he is not aware of any matters referred to solicitors other than those disclosed.

3. In appropriate circumstances, auditors may decide to obtain written confirmations from third parties of certain representations made by directors, for example the identification and appraisal of contingent liabilities. In the field of legal actions the normal and proper source of such confirmations is the company's legal advisers.

4. Requests for such confirmations should be kept within the solicitor-client relationship and should thus be issued by the client with a request that a copy of the reply should be sent direct to the auditors.

5. In order to ascertain whether the information provided by the directors is complete, auditors, especially in certain overseas countries, may decide to arrange for solicitors to be requested to advise whether they have matters in hand which are not listed in the letter of request, and to provide information as to the likely amounts involved. When considering such a non-specific inquiry, auditors should note that the Council of the Law Society has advised solicitors that it is unable to recommend them to comply with requests for information which are more widely drawn than the specimen form of wording set out in paragraph 6 below.

6. In these circumstances, the inquiry should normally list matters identified as having been referred to the company's legal advisers in accordance with paragraph 2 (e) above. The following form of wording, appropriate to specific inquiries, has been agreed between the Councils of the Law Society and the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales as one which may be properly addressed to, and answered by, solicitors:

'In connection with the preparation and audit of our accounts for the year ended . . . the directors have made estimates of the amounts of the ultimate liabilities (including costs) which might be incurred, and are regarded as material, in relation to the following matters on which you have been consulted. We should be obliged if you would confirm that in your opinion these estimates are reasonable.

Matter	Estimated liability including costs.'

7. The Council of the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales understands the reasons for the view of the Council of the Law Society regarding non-specific inquiries, but nevertheless believes that there may be circumstances in which it is necessary as an audit procedure for an inquiry of a general nature to be addressed to the solicitors in order to confirm that the information provided by the directors is complete in all material particulars.

8. If the outcome of the inquiries set out in paragraphs 2 and 5 above appears satisfactory, auditors would not normally regard the absence of a corroboration of the completeness of a list of legal matters as a reason in itself for qualifying their report. If the inquiries lead to the discovery of significant matters not previously identified, the auditors will wish to extend their inquiries and to request their clients to address further inquiries to, or arrange a meeting with, the solicitors, at which the auditors will wish to be present. If, however, having regard to all the circumstances, the auditors are unable to satisfy themselves that they have received all the information they require for the purpose of their audit, they must qualify their report.

COMPUTER COMMENTARY

Multi-access and Multi-programs

TWO effective, though dissimilar, data processing services of appreciable size are now operative. One has been introduced by Baric Computing Services (a company set up jointly by Barclays Bank and International Computers, as previously announced in The Accountant), and the other by the National Data Processing Service of the Post Office.

The Baric plan – called Interact 75 – is one of multi-access to a powerful, centrally situated computer from remote terminals in user's offices. Multi-access systems in themselves are not new – banks other than Barclays use them between branches and central computers, and some make payroll services available to customers. However, Baric will be providing business packages on instructions transmitted from terminals. The central computer is an ICL Series 4-75 and the recommended terminal, a Friden 7102/75.

An example of an available package is a comprehensive on-line sales order processing system covering automatic preparation of invoices, up-dating of sales ledgers and stock records, and the provision of credit control information, statements, month-end reconciliations, sales analyses and statistics. All these functions can be undertaken by the computer on receipt of details taken from basic orders, and simulation studies have indicated that the average time between the end of a user's message and the beginning of the computer's response is approximately 8–10 seconds.

Operating a Friden terminal linked to the Baric computer system.

Typical users are likely to be manufacturing companies with between 200 and 2,000 employees or distribution companies with an annual turnover in excess of £1 million. With stock control, and processing of from 100 to 500 invoices per day, the cost of a package would range from £6,000 to £15,000 per annum.

With one thing in common, namely a powerful ICL System 4 computer (in this case the 4-70), the NDPS plan differs from that of Baric as it is 'in-house' and processes source documents in batches from punched cards or paper tape. Documents have to be sent by post or transport to the centre and print-outs are subsequently delivered to customers.

The first commercial centre of NDPS has been set up at Schweppes House, St Albans (on the advice of Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Co), and although a seven-year contract has been agreed with Cadbury Schweppes, valued at more than £3 million, computer time not used for the group will be utilized by NDPS for other customers of theirs, and appropriate rebates given to Cadbury Schweppes.

Should the group expand and require all the computer time at St Albans, the Post Office has other System 4 machines in operation in London, Bootle and Leeds, with more on order.

Total value of the installation is £850,000 and on it NDPS will run programs designed by Cadbury Schweppes for the group's sales ledger, invoicing, marketing, sales statistics and file maintenance. There are more than 200 individual programs, of which 150 will be run daily, written mainly in COBOL but some in Usercode languages.

Both Interact 75 and NDPS plans are rented by customers, except that the Friden terminal of the Baric scheme may be purchased or leased – outright cost would be approximately £3,000 with an overall installation charge of £1,000.

Compact Line Printer

A FEW months ago a small computer was launched – the Database 404 – at a minimum cost of £5,000, but this price could well rise to £35,000 depending on configurations and peripheral equipment required. Two new additions to the peripheral equipment for this machine have now been announced – Database Alpha and Database Beta.

The Alpha is a compact line printer operating at up to 300 lines per minute which can be used as a terminal line printer by being interfaced to a terminal computer – the Database 404 for example. Two models can be supplied: one coping with 80 columns at a price of £4,200, and another with 132 columns costing £4,950.

Although both the Alpha and Beta can be used as auxiliary printers, and when added to an existing installation make uneconomic tasks into effective information retrieval, e.g., exception reports and program messages, the Beta is a serial printer having a variety of advantages. As an example, standard business forms of up to six copies can be handled, it can control computer systems by virtue of its high speed input/output device, and as a serial printer can operate reliably at up to 30 characters per second. Its price ranges from £2,240 for 'receive only' to £3,180 for 'automatic send/receive'.

ANOTHER line printer, also with an output of 300 lines a minute, is specially sound-proofed for operator comfort. This is the Type 112 from Honeywell which is designed to supplement the present type 122 line printer used with the Honeywell 110 computer. Available with a standard 120 print positions, an extended print option permits 132 positions. The price of this unit is £8,565, deliveries being made from Scotland.

Computer Society's Examinations

RESULTS of Parts I and II of the British Computer Society's entrance examinations held in May were announced recently. In Part I, 31 per cent of the candidates passed, whilst in Part II the percentage of passes was 48 per cent.

To qualify for Part I, which was conducted at eight centres in the United Kingdom, candidates had to select two subjects from a list of six options in addition to the general papers, and out of a total of 167 who sat, 52 were successful.

It was the first time that Part II of the examination had been held, as the requirements for taking it included the provision that candidates must either have passed Part I (held for the first time in 1969), or have gained exemption from it. Out of nineteen candidates who sat for Part II (which is on honours degree level) nine were successful. The examination was held in three centres – Edinburgh, London and Manchester.

Computer Broking

WHEN commenting in these columns on electronic data processing equipment and systems, the accent is invariably on new machines. However, just as in most industries there is a market for used assets, so it is with computers.

There are brokers who bring together computer owners and potential purchasers, apart from dealing in computer hardware on its own account. Promodata, a multi-national group of companies, announced recently that its new British company could conduct business in complete computer systems, individual units or clusters of units. In addition to handling all UK business, subsidiaries would be established in the sterling area, and there would be exports to North America and Europe.

Despite growing interest in independent computer brokerage, operations have generally remained within national boundaries, and have not taken advantage of the essentially international character of the computer industry. Promodata, through its developing network of companies, seeks to change this trend and deal on a world-wide basis. Initially concentrating on systems manufactured by the major hardware companies such as IBM and ICL, it proposes to offer prospective sellers of computers a multi-national market place, and prospective purchasers would have a much wider choice, as well as the benefit of an international network with relative international pricing policies.

Data Collection at Seven Factories

A £30,000 ORDER for data collection equipment which will be installed at seven factories throughout the U.K. has been obtained by Addressograph-Multigraph to provide input to the ICL System 4-50 computer recently installed at Turner & Newall subsidiary, Turners Asbestos Cement Co Ltd, at Trafford Park, Manchester.

Addressograph plastic data cards embossed with fixed information, product codes, etc., will be used in conjunction with the A-M 12-87-5 data recorders capable of entering variable information. The data recorders will be located throughout the factory floor areas and will produce documents which will be collected and sent to Trafford Park, where they will be passed through the Addresso-am sure you would not wish to press me for details that might prejudice the outcome'.

The shop equipment division's 'misfortunes' were described as 'largely due to internal difficulties' but there is confidence in a new managing director and a new management team.

Summing up, Mr D'Arcy Biss gave four main reasons for the poor results: firstly, a £119,000 fall back in confectionery profits because prices were not raised sufficiently quickly for fear of losing markets; secondly, the rent and standing costs for non-operational sites for the cash and carry depots and over-optimism of the speed at which earlier wrong decisions could be corrected; thirdly, the evaporation of retail tobacco and confectionery profits, and finally, a misjudgement of management for the shop equipment division.

The hope of better things during the current year is based on a better rate of confectionery division profit, the near elimination of cash and carry losses, a return to tobacco and confectionery retail profits and a recovery, although a slow one, in shop equipment.

Property values

Note 12 to the accounts, referring to the exceptional debit of £247,000, turns on the point that when the group's bakery companies were sold the price was conditional on the buyers obtaining a professional valuation of the property.

It is explained that the board took the precaution of having their own professional valuation made but 'as the two valuations were much apart, the matter went to arbitration'.

The arbitrator awarded against the company and for the buyers. By subsequent negotiations in September 1969 the price was improved, but even so the company's anticipated capital profit of £205,000 was not realized and the necessary corrections are shown in the accounts.

There is clearly a difference between a buying valuation and a selling valuation of properties. The two valuers are looking at the same property from different angles, although no doubt neither of them would professionally admit to any difference between buying and selling valuing.

The Future

THE paragraphs headed 'The future' or 'Prospects' are even more difficult to write under current conditions than they normally are. Company chairmen are adept at hedging their forecasts around with such phrases as 'subject to there being no major upheavals over which we have no power or control', but more and more chairmen are ducking the forecasting bit altogether.

Mr S. H. W. Pumphrey, chairman of Wheatsheaf Investments, a substantial company in food distribution and retailing, goes so far in his review as to consider 'it would be a gross indiscretion to foreshadow in precise terms how profits will develop during the year'.

He reports that sales to date showing an increase of 17 per cent are due to the extent of 'perhaps 6 per cent to 7 per cent' to inflated prices. On the other hand, 'the present wave of rising costs must have an impact on the business'.

Mr Pumphrey says 'I am only prepared to say that business should expand during the current year, and that profitability should therefore increase. However, because of all the current uncertainties . . . to quantify or guarantee is most unwise'.

The report of current-year sales running 17 per cent up on last year may be put against the 1969-70 performance by the group of an 18 per cent rise in turnover and a 10 per cent gain in profits.

Figures v. Charts

BRIEF Home and Overseas Statistics 1961 to 1970' is the heading on page 12 of the Metal Box company's report. The statistics are of home and overseas sales and home and overseas profits, leading on to 'profits after taxes' and 'profit available'. Appropriation of that profit is shown and the 'Funds employed' and 'Employment of funds' and finally two lines for additions to fixed assets and depreciation provided.

On the opposite page, in glorious colour, are four columnar charts showing sales (home and overseas); profits before loan interest and taxes; taxes, dividends and retentions, and finally, growth of assets. In other words the four columnar charts in glorious colour set out precisely the same information as the figures on the facing page. The only difference is that one shows it at much heavier cost than the other - colour printing being the costly thing it is.

Although the columnar charts are well done - that showing the taxes, dividends and retentions being particularly ingenious - to this column's simple mind the plain figures on page 12 show it all just as well.

Sir Lindsay Parkinson

THE civil engineering and building industry is littered with bitter company experience - if not of entire failure, then of periodic and severe setback. It only takes one major long-term contract to 'go wrong' and the hard work of years, in terms of profits and accumulated reserves, can be set to nothing or something horribly near it.

Particularly impressive, therefore, is the ten-year record of Sir Lindsay Parkinson & Co Ltd set out in the report for 1969. Apart from a very minor setback in 1966, profits have risen over the period from £356,601 pre-tax to £923,274, with capital and reserves growing from £1,982,859 to £4,554,699.

The directors view the business of the group as being of one single class. There is one 'unimportant exception of the ancillary activity of a Golf and Country Club'.

The chairman, Mr A. E. Parkinson, reminds shareholders that because many contracts are of a long-term nature extending in some cases over several years with final settlement taking many months, the results should always be viewed over a number of years rather than by reference to the result of each individual year.

The value of work carried out last year was £23.3 million - an increase of £2.1 million on 1968. Work in hand currently exceeds £50 million, compared with £45 million at this time last year.

Experts confidently predict the stock market will regain its buoyancy one day.

Trouble is, they never name the day.

Or even the year.

While you're waiting, wouldn't it be sensible to have at least some of your money in the Abbey National?

We realise we are not as exciting as the stock market.

We just hand out a steady old 5% whatever gushers are struck or bubbles burst.

Still, our five per cent is better than some five per cents. Because we pay the income tax due on it.

And it's really equivalent to 8½%, if you pay tax at the standard rate.

All this presupposes you want to keep your capital liquid.

If you don't, you can earn a lot more.

Our S.A.Y.E. scheme, for example, gives far more handsome rates completely free of all income tax, surtax and capital gains tax.

And you can earn nearly 12% with our insurance linked Bounty Bonds.

Let's face it, though, you'll never make a killing with the Abbey National.

But you'll never wish you were dead, either.

What the papers say

In recent advertisements we have said a good deal about our expertise as investors in equities, and about our Investor Policy. We admit we're biased. But we have been receiving many favourable independent press comments too.

On 13th December 1969, the Daily Telegraph said: "The Scottish Widows have a special policy which is linked to the performance of their equity investments. They are one of the oldest and most successful mutual life offices. This means that the profits which they make are shared among the policyholders. Over the years these profits have been exceptionally good. The management of the Scottish Widows has a very high reputation for investment skill. The conditions of the policy are also extremely competitive."

On 3rd January 1970, the Daily Express commented: "The Scottish Widows Investor Policy is linked to its own separate fund. But in its short life this has done extremely well... In fact if compared with a conventional unit trust, the Investor Policy would appear in the top five performers over the last two years".

Still sceptical? The coupon below will bring more details about the Investor Policy and the Scottish Widows.

CITY NOTES

THE gilt-edged market has held the centre of the Stock Exchange stage with the powerful performance of prices leading to a second act featuring a £900 million Treasury stock operation in the short- and medium-dated sectors. Such was the institutional demand for gilt-edged that July stock-market turnover as a whole was forced to a record monthly level and the authorities were fast running out of their existing tap stock.

Hence the issue of two new tap stocks with which the Bank of England will attempt to control a market which currently is getting the bulk of institutional investment funds. This presumably presupposes an eventual reduction in interest rates.

There are some indications from the United States that interest rates there may be on the way down. But there is little indication in the state of inflationary things here that UK interest rates can justifiably be reduced.

Although it is widely held that the equity market cannot rise until the gilt-edged market does, there still seems little or no flow of investment money towards equity sectors. There are probably too many fears about pressure on profits for that; and too many statements about the dangers and consequences of present wage demands and price increases.

Lord Stokes's most recent comments on this subject were hardly designed to win friends for equities.

THE Chase Manhattan Bank's annual financial analysis of a number of major petroleum companies reaches the conclusion that if the world-wide requirements for oil in the 1970s are to be fully satisfied, the petroleum industry will have to match the doubling of demand with progressively higher expenditures for capital and exploration.

But the bank considers that, based on the industry's performance in the 1960s, combined with a shortage of capital and a lack of investment incentive 'there is no positive assurance that the petroleum industry will actually spend as much as required'.

The pace of spending, it is considered, may have to increase faster than the rate of market growth because of inflation, additional investments needed to control pollution and a higher level of leasing costs.

The companies studied by the bank represent a major segment of the petroleum industry — more than half the industry's world-wide capital employed.

PENDING a decision on the Heasman Report on Securities Handling, further work on the organization and design of the proposed Stock Exchange inter-firm accounting project has been deferred. Messrs Deloitte Plender Robson Morrow & Co have submitted a report to the Stock Exchange on the organization and design of this project.

A 'directorate' under the chairmanship of Mr K. H. M. Crabbe, Deputy-Chairman of the Stock Exchange, and with Deloitte Plender Robson Morrow & Co as a part-time member, has been set up to carry out feasibility studies and will also be responsible for administering the present settlement services, including budgetary and staffing aspects as well as future development and planning.

The Stock Exchange Council has stated that it is unlikely that any plans for inter-firm accounting will be announced before June 1971. No scheme is likely to be in operation before mid-1972 with the exception that possibly a system of central computerized checking of bargains might be introduced. This will almost certainly be a pre-requisite of any system of central accounting, whatever form this might take.

DISGRUNTLED shareholders in F. W. Woolworth & Co who have demanded more action from the board certainly get it in the company's new programme of store modernization. From September 21st, two stores a week will be renovated between Saturday evening closing and the following Thursday. The programme will take in all the older stores in the company.

Professional Salaries

SIR, - I was interested to read your article on professional salaries ('Current Affairs', August 6th issue), based on a survey by Hamilton Executive Consultants. From my experience in placing staff with professional firms of all sizes, I would comment that the salaries quoted for articulated clerks (£650 for 'O' level school-leavers, £1,200 for graduates) are offered by few firms. I have found that the average salary offered is £550-£600 for 'O' level clerks, and £900-£1,000 for graduates.

The salaries quoted for newly qualified (£2,000-£2,400) and qualified men with two or three years' post-qualification experience (up to £3,000) are now quite common, so that in most cases qualification means at least a doubling up in salary for articulated clerks.

I would disagree with the suggestion that promotion prospects for unqualified staff are so limited that they 'opt out'. With the present shortage of experienced men in the profession, unqualified men can have a better paid, more secure, position than they would get in commerce and industry. I have not yet seen an unqualified man from the profession who has been made redundant.

With regard to an unqualified man applying to different accountancy bodies and competing in industry and commerce as a 'qualified' man, I presume that Hamiltons are referring to those bodies which are generally referred to as 'unrecognized'. As the senior accountants in any company are likely to be members of the three main bodies, it is very unlikely that those unqualified men who become qualified members of any other body can truly compete. This fact is confirmed by most newspaper advertisements, which specify the qualifications required.

Yours faithfully,

London EC2.

Wanted - Finance for the Professions

SIR, - By the time that this letter is published (indeed, if it is published), the rather degrading tumult and shouting over the integration proposals will have died, and a great many of us can return to a more productive life and to a consideration of more practical problems.

The business of running a provincial practice is largely one of finance. A new client of £100 annual fee standing (or 100 guineas if one is old-fashioned enough) requires to be financed for that £100 for, perhaps, 18 months. Increasingly, bank finance is difficult to obtain and the younger generation of managers and local directors seem to be less aware of the problems of long-term finance of this nature.

What is required is a specialist type of finance corporation set up, in my opinion, on ICFC lines which can offer provincial firms long-term finance on the security of their practices. The 'nationals' do not have any problem of finance because of the nature of their particular range of clients.

There is, of course, the existing facility offered by certain insurance companies to potential new partners of a practice, but this is only a substitution arrangement to placate (partly) an elderly outgoing partner. It goes nowhere to provide finance for expansion of a partnership per se.

ICFC is a government-backed consortium of the clearing banks established for the provision of finance for industry. They hesitate to venture into the field of pure commerce and the professions, I suspect, because of the inability in a large number of cases of being unable to participate in future profitability.

What, therefore, is needed is a new approach to finance for the professions - not only accountancy but architects, surveyors and veterinary surgeons, to name a few - in fact, any profession where tradition demands that an account shall be rendered after the service has been completed without, as in the legal profession, having moneys already in hand from which fees can be met automatically.

Should this letter arouse any interest in the profession, or provide the germ of an idea with the clearing banks, I shall be only too pleased to expound my theories at greater length.

Yours faithfully,

Bridgwater.

The business has been established about 120 years, and is situated in an Essex town. The profit before providing for depreciation or owners' salary was for each of the past three financial years ended about April 30th, as follows:

LETTER FROM AMERICA

Pull-back on Pooling

from Our New York Correspondent

THREE months ago, when the Council of the English Institute announced that it was including merger accounting among its subjects for special study and recommendation, it must have had American experience in mind. Recent events in the United States have underlined the difficulty of reaching any kind of agreement on accounting standards once a practice like pooling of interests has taken root.

In The Accountant of July 23rd (page 115), it was pointed out that the rules proposed for mergers by the Accounting Principles Board had stirred up extreme opposition in some quarters. Mr Leonard M. Savoie, Executive Vice-President of the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants, admitted at the time to great concern over this hostility, and to much eagerness to get past the July deadline for final approval of the proposed Opinion. In the event, the new rules were approved on the last day, July 31st – but at the cost of two vital concessions to the opposition.

The size test, already relaxed since the draft of the rules was circulated in the spring, has now been dropped entirely. Consequently, there will be no return to the earlier (and, to some accountants, purer) practice of adopting the pooling technique only when the two partners in a merger are of approximately equal size. Secondly, in order to allow merger-minded companies time to adjust to the new regulations contained in the latest Opinion, its application will be delayed for two months from August 31st, the date originally announced.

Although the outcome of this long struggle has been less decisive than was expected, the American Institute's action will certainly help to clear the air. And it has been taken none too soon. Several glamorous conglomerates that drew too freely on the pooling principle now lie in ruins. But the bond and stock-markets are beginning to recover, and with them the ambition to build new empires. Take-over offers are starting to reappear in the headlines, and old merger plans are being revived.

With the guidance of the new Opinion, it is to be hoped that some of the earlier excesses will be avoided, and that American experience will become a more attractive subject of study by the working party charged by the English Council with the development of a new set of merger accounting standards.

Current Law

Inheritance: Tenancy in Common

THE testator, a widower, directed that his estate (the principal asset being a freehold bungalow) should be realized by sale, and the proceeds distributed equally in five shares between his two sons, A and F, their wives, and the widow of a deceased son, C. These instructions constituted an express trust for sale and (under section 25 (1) of the Law of Property Act 1925) an implied power to postpone sale.

At the time of the testator's death, A was estranged from his wife and was sharing the bungalow with his father, and he continued to reside in it thereafter. F was the appointed executor of his father's will, but appears to have taken no steps to realize the property prior to his own death several years later. At that time his widow, Mrs F, became entitled to her late husband's share as well as her own, and she took out letters of administration de bonis non [administratis] thus becoming the legal owner of the bungalow. In order to sell it with vacant possession and divide the proceeds in accordance with the original will, she brought an action against A for possession. A claimed that he was an equitable tenant in common with the other beneficiaries and could not be turned out of possession.

The Court of Appeal unanimously rejected A's case. The object of the will was the sale and division of the proceeds of the bungalow, so that the beneficiaries were not tenants in common of the bungalow, but only of the proceeds of sale. A had no equitable tenancy, and the action for possession against him should succeed.

Barclay v. Barclay ([1970] 2 All ER 676).

Professional Privilege in Criminal Proceedings

PROCEEDINGS had been instituted against X by the Board of Trade under section 332 (3) of the Companies Act 1948 (which relates to the carrying on of business with intent to defraud creditors). Amongst the papers handed over to the provisional liquidator was found a copy of a letter voluntarily written to X by a solicitor, warning him that his conduct was likely to incur serious consequences. The Board of Trade desired to tender this letter in evidence, as being relevant to the criminal offences with which X was charged. X replied that the letter, being protected by professional privilege, was a confidential document; and that relevance alone could not override that privilege unless it was shown that the professional advice was in furtherance of some crime or fraud.

An injunction to restrain use of the letter could not be granted against the Board of Trade (as a department of the Crown) and X therefore sought an equitable declaration that the letter was not admissible in evidence against him.

Goff, J, held that on the present limited facts the letter was a privileged and confidential document, and that to make relevance the only test would be to take too narrow a view of privilege in criminal cases. However, the private right of the individual conflicted with the interest of the State to apprehend and prosecute criminals, and it was not a proper use of the equitable jurisdiction to restrain the Crown from adducing evidence which was plainly relevant and otherwise admissible. The duty of a department of State to prosecute X under the Companies Acts must prevail over his limited proprietary right in equity to restrain a breach of confidence.

Butler v. Board of Trade ([1970] 114 SJ 604).

Student Roundabout

STUDENT LIAISON COMMITTEE

FOR some time – as previously reported in 'Roundabout' – a liaison committee drawn from Institute Council committees and from the National Executive Committee of ACASS has met at intervals to discuss matters of concern to students. The committee decided that its work called for meetings every two months and the first two regular meetings were held in May and July.

At the May meeting, serious student disquiet at the future status of their societies' given integration was greatly reduced by the assurances of the Council committee members. Closer constitutional links with district societies were not intended or expected to deprive students of autonomy and responsibility in arranging student activities. It was stressed that ACASS and its National Executive Committee were valued as a medium for consultation on student matters and were expected to continue to have an important role.

Financial policy, it was stated, would be much as at present with funds derived from students being applied for student purposes, including grants to societies and related Institute administration costs. There was also a constructive discussion at the meeting on insurance cover for articulated clerks.

In July, the committee reviewed its thoughts on the status of student members under integration, on provision for consultation and representation and on the benefits to be received. It also studied the problems of developing professional education through the public education system in the light of student submission that those who could afford private tuition had an advantage over those who could not.

Those attending in July, under the chairmanship of Mr A. H. Walton, F.C.A., Deputy President, were Messrs D. A. Boothman, R. W. Cox, P. M. Duffell and E. F. G. Whinney from Council committees, and Messrs A. J. Cross, D. du Pré, D. Gilks, W. L. Hagan and P. S. McDonald from ACASS.

HULL SOCIETY'S AGM

AT THE recent seventy-first annual meeting of The Chartered Accountants' Students' Society of Kingston upon Hull, Mr K. P. Helm F.C.A., F.T.I.L., was re-elected President of the Society for 1970-71. Mr Helm is a senior partner in Hodgson Harris & Co, the firm he joined on leaving Rossall School – his father having then been a partner since 1897. He qualified in 1930 and was admitted as a partner in 1944. During his youth he was an active member of the students' society and later the district society, of which he was President in 1959.

Mr Helm tells us that he now has little time available for recreational pursuits but lists his interests as gardening and community service in his home town of Bridlington.

On being elected, the President thanked the active committee under the able leadership of the retiring chairman, Mr Tony Sheppeck, A.C.A., and wished the society every success in the forthcoming year. He pointed out that as this was the seventy-first annual general meeting, it made the society 'old men' compared with the senior society which was only just entering its forty-fourth year. Indeed, he informed those present that the students' society was the vehicle from which the senior society was formed.

Mr Brian S. Atkinson, F.C.A., A.T.I.L., was elected the new Chairman for the forthcoming year. He was educated in Yorkshire and served articles with John Gordon, Harrison Taylor & Co, of Leeds. After qualifying in 1957 he joined the staff of Price Waterhouse & Co, where he remained until 1966 when he joined the staff of Buckley, Hall, Devin & Co, of Hull, in which firm he is now a partner.

Mr Brian Atkinson
Chairman, Hull CASS.

Mr Atkinson informs us that his main outside interests are golf and the local Junior Chamber of Commerce. He feels that the main task of the committee in the coming year is to build upon the strong foundations laid by the previous year's committee which had created a revival of interest in the Society's affairs in the Hull area.

Other officers elected for the ensuing year are:

Vice-Chairman: Mr C. R. Palmer, A.C.A.

Secretary: Mr A. W. Perry, The Ancient Manor House, Westella, East Yorkshire.

Deputy-Secretary: Mr A. R. H. Dales.

Treasurer: Mr D. Gesua.

Deputy-Treasurer: Mr D. Robinson.

Auditor: Mr I. Massie, F.C.A.

Past year's Activities

Following the disappointments of recent years, the committee was pleased to report a far more successful year with an encouraging revival in student interest.

A restricted lecture programme was re-introduced following its cancellation the previous year. The average attendance at each lecture was about 40 students.

A computer business exercise was arranged during the beginning of the year making use of the Corporation's computer. Over 80 students participated in the exercise, the eventual winning team being made up of students from Jones, Hutchinson & Co and E. Churchill Mallet & Co.

Following the success of the computer business exercise an investment game was started in April which has been supported by over 100 students. The game runs until September when the winning team will be announced.

Socially, the Society has had an active year, arranging three successful dances and the annual dinner was revived again. At sport, there were two football fixtures – both of which were convincing victories for the society – and a five-a-side soccer competition at Hull University supported by 100 students.

BIRMINGHAM SOCIETY'S OXFORD COURSE

AS PREVIOUSLY announced in 'Roundabout', the twenty-first residential course arranged by the joint lecture committee of The Birmingham and West Midlands Society of Chartered Accountants and The Birmingham Chartered Accountants Students' Society will take place at Merton College, Oxford, from September 16th-19th. The programme for the course includes lectures specifically to assist those students who are studying for the Part I and Part II of the Final examination, in addition to talks on more general subjects by well-known members of the profession.

On the afternoon of the first day Mr M. R. Harris, F.C.A., will present a paper on 'The business approach to the modern audit' which will probably be followed by a case study. Management information systems will be dealt with by Professor R. I. Tricker, F.C.A., J.DIP.M.A., and tax reform by Mr B. W. Sutherland, F.C.A.; the specific examination subjects will be in the capable hands of Mr K. S. Carmichael, F.C.A., Mr M. Worthington, F.C.A., A.C.W.A., A.T.I.I., Mr R. C. Ind, B.A., A.C.A., and Mr J. Martyn, barrister-at-law. Lectures will be followed by discussion groups of approximately ten students led by young chartered accountants.

Evening sessions will include a talk by Mr T. A. Hamilton Baynes, M.A., F.C.A., a former member of the Institute's Council, and a joint function is envisaged with members of The Chartered Accountant Students' Society of London, who will be on a course in Oxford at the same time.

Fee for the course will be £12 10s per student and applications should be made as soon as possible to the administrative officer, BCASS, Fountain Court, Steelhouse Lane, Birmingham 4.

RIVERBOAT SHUFFLE

THE Birmingham Chartered Accountant Students' Society is holding a Riverboat Shuffle on August 29th. Departure will be from Stourport-on-Severn at 8.30 p.m. and after many 'navigational exercises' will return at 11.30 p.m.

Dancing on board will be to a discotheque, there will be a free buffet and, of course, a bar – members and guests will be expected to pay for drinks. Tickets are 25s and are available from the Library, Fountain Court, Steelhouse Lane, Birmingham 4 or from any committee member.

STUDENTS LOSE GOLF MATCH

In a match played at Hadley Wood Golf Club in Hertfordshire on July 23rd, the Chartered Accountants' Golfing Society beat the Students' Golfing Society by 9½ matches to 5½ matches and won back the Pittman Plate, which had been in the possession of the students since 1968.

In fairness to the students, it should be mentioned that two points gained by the senior players were attributable to a gentleman who was created an honorary chartered accountant for the day. He was, in fact, the Secretary of the Hadley Wood Golf Club, Mr C. W. Martin, and his contribution to the senior golfers' score whilst true may not have been wholly fair.

The competition consisted of foursomes matches in the morning and singles in the afternoon. The full results were as follows:

equality of profit-sharing entitlement to retirement pensions out of contributions provided whilst a Partner.

We believe we can achieve our ultimate objectives on our own in due time, but would prefer one or more firms with a similar outlook and objective to join us. Our

The text of this well-known and authoritative work has been reviewed and considerably extended to meet the changes in auditing philosophy and company law over the period since the last edition was published, without destroying the basic views on the subject which the original author held in so individual a way.

The requirements of the Companies Acts of 1948 and 1967 are fully discussed, and the need to pay particular attention to points of difficulty and controversy has not been ignored. Legal decisions are discussed and more fully reported than is usual in such works, and recent developments such as statistical sampling techniques, internal control questionnaires, flow-charting, etc., are reviewed. A new chapter has been added on auditors' working papers and the City code on take-overs is considered.

The 'Notes on Auditing' of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales are reproduced in full, and the recommendations of the Jenkins Committee relevant to auditors are quoted.

This new edition has been designed to meet present-day needs, while preserving the distinctive character of the work.

The opportunity has been taken in the third edition of this now well-established book, to introduce new material reflecting the more important changes or landmarks in law and practice which have come into effect during the past eight years. These include an analysis of the provisions of the Monopolies and Mergers Act 1965, the aims and scope of the Industrial Reorganization Corporation, the text of The City Code on Take-overs and Mergers and appropriate extracts from the 1966 Stock Exchange regulations.

Moreover, two entirely new chapters have been introduced. One examines the defensive measures that can be mounted against a bid and gives a short account of the abortive I.C.I. bid for Courtaulds and the long drawn out fight for Telephone Rentals among others. The other new chapter considers the economic and political issues which involve both Government and industry when bids emanate from foreign sources.

All in all, this book gives a penetrating account of the problems – human and financial – which confront the accountant and other financial experts who may be called in to advise on the merits of a merger or the terms of a bid for control.

This book was first published some three years ago and has since gained wide acceptance as a guide to modern audit techniques and procedures. Now in its second edition, the book offers practical guidance, backed up by detailed questionnaires and check lists, on how an audit should be carried out under the United Kingdom Companies Acts. It also provides guidance on the additional responsibilities which arise when an auditor is reporting on the United Kingdom subsidiaries of United States or Canadian companies.

Important new features of this edition are the rewritten chapters on 'Investments', 'Taxation' and 'Auditing Procedures for Computer Applications'. Furthermore, the whole of the book has been revised so as to reflect the requirements of the Companies Act 1967, and the recent pronouncements of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales.

For new readers of this book it may be convenient to mention that in recent years the whole approach to auditing has changed. The old concepts of routine checking and vouching have gone and new standards are being set and new procedures evolved. This has become more than ever necessary by the increasing use of computers for which auditing techniques now have to be designed.

Taking as his starting-point the system of internal control installed by management, the auditor's task is to point out the weaknesses to his client and to make a tailor-made audit programme to fit the job in which tests of the day-to-day transactions are cut to a minimum. The auditor now observes, at regular intervals, the physical stocktaking carried out by his client's staff; if his report to shareholders is not to be qualified, he requires his client to maintain a higher standard of book-keeping and accounts than hitherto. His audit is carefully planned and is backed by a well defined system for the preparation, filing and presentation of working papers.

Separated Brethren

FOR the second time within a matter of weeks, the result of a poll has confounded all previous forecasts. It had been realized for some time that the bulk of the opposition to the 'Scheme for the Development of the Accountancy Profession' was concentrated within the membership of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, and that attainment of the requisite two-thirds majority to amend the Institute's Royal Charter and bye-laws was thus not a foregone conclusion. But not even the most hardened and optimistic opponents of the scheme could have foreseen that the proposals would fail to obtain, in last Friday's poll, even a simple majority. As reported elsewhere in this issue, the definitive resolution was lost by a vote of 13,700 in favour and 16,845 against.

Announcing this result, the President, Mr C. Croxton-Smith, M.A., LL.B., F.C.A., said 'I am naturally disappointed at this result. The Council will now consider, as a matter of urgency, the policies which must be followed to secure the future strength and development of the Institute. The Council will therefore at its next meeting appoint a special committee to examine the objectives of the Institute and the policies it should pursue in the present circumstances.'

Similar views have been expressed by other leaders of the profession. For The Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants (the first body, in point of time, to accept the proposals) their President, Mr F. Stephenson, F.I.M.T.A., said 'I can only say that this decision is in my view a sad day for the accountancy profession, and an even sadder day for those men of vision and courage who have given so much of their personal time and effort in an endeavour to achieve integration and all that it means for the widening and strengthening of professional competence and greater assurance to the public. This must put back the possibility of unification of the profession for many years, and possibly open the door even more widely to the emergence of new accountancy bodies fixing their own standards of training and competence.'

We share with these two Presidents in their disappointment. Whilst the columns of The Accountant have been open throughout the controversy of the past two years to the expression of all shades of opinion, our own view has always been, and remains, that the 1968 proposals offered a comprehensive plan for posterity which merited a better fate. 'Integration' will inevitably prove, in the coming months, an unpopular and a delicate subject, but at some future date, and in a manner not yet envisaged, rationalization of the profession's present structure must come.

It is at least satisfactory to reflect that the vote was in every sense a conclusive one. A majority of 3,145 may fairly be considered clear-cut. Approximately 64 per cent of the Institute's total membership voted, this being a noticeably higher proportion than in any of the other participating bodies, or on any other issue within the Institute's recent history. The Institute's adverse vote of 16,845 outnumbers the total favourable votes cast elsewhere; and even if one includes as potentially favourable those members of the Institute who failed to vote (and who, being thus indifferent to the scheme, would presumably have accepted it in the event), the requisite two-thirds majority would not be achieved. By any assessment, the present views of the membership have been made clear beyond the bounds of legitimate dispute.

If this is the present position, what of the future? The demands of an increasingly commercial and competitive society must be met for the time being by a fragmented profession which, as we wrote when the scheme was first published, has been 'almost notorious throughout its history for the multiplicity of constituent institutes, societies, associations, faculties and groups'. At least the pattern of voting has removed any need for recrimination or a search for scapegoats. In other circumstances it might have been tempting to accuse a few individuals, whose opposition has been particularly determined and perhaps more articulate than most, of having wrecked the scheme; but it seems plain that these gentlemen have done nothing more than to provide, at the most, a focus for the considerable measure of dissatisfaction and dissent which already existed. In fact, the proxies collected by Mr H. T. Nicholson, F.C.A., and his supporters amounted to less than half of those who combined to defeat the resolution.

One of the first questions to which the members of the Institute's Council must now address themselves is to consider why the fruits of so much careful consideration and detailed explanation failed to command a wider acceptance. A possible conjecture is that the Council was if anything too assiduous in its commendation of the scheme to members, some of whom felt that they were being unfairly pressurized and cast their votes 'agin the government' in consequence. Other members made clear in debate their dislike of the presentation of the scheme as a 'package deal' and, finding themselves unable to accept it, warts and all, voted against this or that particular wart. Such attitudes are, of course, irrational, and their full effect will never be known with certainty: these protest votes may in themselves have been marginal, but in the present context they were also cumulative.

As reported in The Accountant of May 21st, The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants had already issued to its members the report of a study group into the main aspects of ICWA policy if integration was not in the event accepted. Commenting on the English Institute's poll result, the President of the ICWA, Mr Stanley Woods, F.C.W.A., F.A.C.C.A., F.C.I.S., said it would now be for his Council to consider 'the action to be taken, on the guidelines previously laid down, for the future development of the Institute as the specialist body in management accountancy'. The Council of The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants will also meet at an early date to co-ordinate its views on the new situation.

Speaking from his office after the Institute's vote had been announced, the President of the Association, Mr E. A. Lediard Smith, F.A.C.C.A., said 'The results are the more shattering when it is realized that more than five years of arduous and time-consuming effort has proved fruitless - or, at least, not very rewarding. Many will feel that the clock has been put back, and that at a time when, more than ever before, a united effort is necessary to ensure progress. I cannot help but feel that an opportunity has been lost.'

Meanwhile, the members of the English Institute have emphatically declared their preference for a selective profession, and have by implication accepted the heavy burden of justifying their position by results. The Institute, which represents the substantial majority of practising accountants in Britain and includes the auditors of most of our major public companies, has been a prime target in the last year or two for a veritable broadside of criticism directed at accountants' professional standards, principles and independence: its position in the eyes of industry and of the public at large will depend very largely on the work of the steering committee on the reform of accounting standards, and on its capacity to attract in open competition with all comers the new entrants who will have the mental capacity, integrity and determination to bear the burden of future years.

While many accountants and others will feel, with Mr Lediard Smith, that the clock has been put back, at least it continues to run: and although the negotiations of five years have been denied their full fruition, they will not altogether have failed if they afford at least a foundation for future ventures in professional co-operation. The six leading bodies of accountants have been brought more closely together than at any time in their history, and far closer than would have seemed possible a generation ago, which is a solid achievement. The embarrassing fall from the arch of its keystone has not, we are confident, imperilled those foundations.

Pro Forma

IN the dreary days of 1945-51, Sir Alan Herbert said that obtaining a form was one element of 'conspiring to build a house', and 'Sillince' of Punch created the overbearing Civil Servant who objected that 'I'm afraid we can't consider your application for a permit unless you can produce a permit to apply for a permit'. Although the immediate post-war years presented their own problems, the force of these rather wry jests is perhaps not entirely spent in 1970.

Contrary to popular impression, form-filling began a good many years prior to 1945: but the development of the Welfare State and the increasing complexities of present-day economic and social life have enormously increased the incidence of it in recent years. Evidence given before the Bolton Committee from several quarters has stressed the burdensome effect of statistical and other returns upon the smaller business, as witness, for example, the following submissions made on behalf of the Smaller Businesses Association:

'This represents one of the major irritations which bedevil small firms. We believe that the number of authorities which have power to issue statutory forms (i.e., demanding information) runs into three score or more. . . . Some of these boards also use their statutory power to demand quite extensive information about the activities of a firm even where that firm is making no financial or other claim on the board. . . . There is no excuse whatsoever for different statutory bodies to be asking for substantially the same information, but in slightly differently designed forms.'

The 'statutory power' referred to in these submissions arises for the most part under the Statistics of Trade Act which provides for penalties in the event of non-compliance. According to a spokesman for the Central Statistical Office last week, the number of prosecutions initiated under this Act could be 'counted in dozens', coupled with the threat of prosecution in 'rather more' cases.

Whilst the expressed view of the Smaller Businesses Association that 'the resentment which form-filling is causing in industry, and the time and money which it is absorbing, makes the eventual use of the statistics not worth while' may appear as an extreme, the existence and use of these coercive powers, and the number of separate protests made to the Bolton Committee, do at least raise the presumption of a prima facie case which calls for an answer.

This evidently is the committee's opinion also, since the Central Statistical Office has been invited to submit its own evidence on the burden of statistical form-filling. The CSO maintains a survey control unit which is responsible for undertaking a critical survey of all new inquiries for statistical information from departments of the government statistical service, and it might have been thought that such a unit was well placed to speak authoritatively on the incidence of form-filling. Unfortunately, this is not the case.

The CSO submissions to the Bolton Committee are specifically related only to information collected by the government statistical service and do not include, for example, 'administrative forms such as PAYE returns or applications for investment grants', or inquiries conducted by the industrial training boards, or by any bodies which are not central government departments. Within these limited terms of reference, it is claimed by the CSO that a high proportion of inquiries do not go to small firms at all, or affect less than 1 per cent of small firms. About one-tenth of all inquiries do affect 20 per cent or more of small firms, but these are for the most part 'infrequent' (defined as at annual or longer intervals) or involve only a simplified version of the standard form.

These figures are in themselves reassuring, but the assertion that the various exclusions are 'not very significant' in the context of the burden on small firms is plainly open to debate. Certainly these exclusions would be categorized by very many people in everyday parlance as 'government forms'; and as many of them, whatever their origin, are time-consuming and incorporate directly or indirectly a penalty for non-completion, the CSO's rather narrow view of its responsibilities is unlikely to appease either the Smaller Businesses Association or the correspondent who complained in our issue of July 9th of 'those damn statistics'. This again (the noun, rather than the expletive) is a word which members of the general public are apt to use in a wider and more general sense than does the professional statistician, and the small trader is less affected by the ultimate purpose of a form than by the practical difficulties of completing it.

It would be impracticable for any business to look for a complete exemption from form-filling. Statistical information is essential to both government and business if informed policy decisions are to be made, and there is no magical source of this data. It is only rarely that statistics emerge as a by-product of some administrative procedure, and if they are wanted then they have to be collected.

The CSO is plainly aware of its responsibility to ensure that data is collected in an economic fashion, and within its own sphere of activity has made considerable use of sampling and exception techniques to alleviate the burden of form-filling upon smaller firms. It is, however, clear that the office, despite its imposing title, has neither jurisdiction over nor knowledge of a material part of the form-filling that is expected of businesses large or small.

Based on American experience, it has been suggested that the burden upon the business community of reporting for statistical purposes is not more than 22 per cent of the reporting burden for all purposes, and may be as low as 15 per cent: but this hypothesis is based upon an analogy which, by virtue of the separation of powers in the USA between Federal and State agencies, may be less than exact. We no longer require a permit to apply for a permit, but the suggestion of a statute-backed inquiry to establish the full extent of form-filling is perhaps not as cynical as it sounds.

Chartered Accountants Reject Integration

TO an audience of about 20 people assembled in the scrutineers' office last Friday, the President of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales announced the result of the poll on the two resolutions debated at the Institute's special meeting on June 24th. Under the Institute's bye-laws, a two-thirds majority was necessary for each resolution to become effective.

The first resolution, which sought to adopt the draft integration agreement already accepted by the other participating bodies, was defeated by 16,845 votes against to 13,700 in favour. The extent of this opposition clearly surprised some members of the audience, who on previous experience had expected the resolution to receive at least a simple majority.

A second resolution to amend the Institute's subscription structure received 13,712 votes in favour and 9,276 against. This resolution failed on two grounds: firstly for want of a two-thirds majority, and secondly by reason of being expressed conditionally upon the success of the principal resolution.

This vote conclusively prevents the scheme for the future of the accountancy profession, as published in 1968 and subsequently debated, from being carried into effect. Apart from the English Institute's participation being an essential element, the Scottish vote in favour was expressly made conditional upon acceptance of the scheme as affecting England and Wales.

The table below records the votes cast by the members of each of the six participating bodies on the definitive resolution to adopt the draft integration agreement, and expresses the numbers voting as a percentage of total membership in each case. The columns are not totalled, in view of the unknown effect of plural votes by those accountants holding a dual qualification.

Post for Cooper Brothers

THE Post Office Users' National Council is 'not just a rubber stamp for the Post Office'. This claim was made earlier this week by Lord Peddie, chairman of the council, after the announcement that Messrs Cooper Brothers & Co had been retained to investigate the proposed increases in postal charges.

Mr Christopher Chataway, Minister of Posts and Telecommunications, has approved Cooper Brothers' engagement. It is believed that this is the first occasion on which a government consultative body has been allowed to employ professional help.

The effect of the proposed increases has been estimated at £114 million in a full year. The present managing director of the Post Office Corporation is also a chartered accountant, Mr Geoffrey H. Vieler, F.C.A.

Simplifying Schedule E

AMONGST the more vociferous critics of our tax system are officials of the Inland Revenue, who know better than anyone the extent to which tax offices are burdened with unproductive work. In The Times last week, an anonymous tax inspector put forward a number of proposals for the administrative simplification of Schedule E, some of which have a logical basis and would perhaps prove less controversial in practice than their author anticipated.

The inspector's first point of attack is the present inclusion of social security pensions and family allowances in PAYE codings, giving rise to a massive re-coding operation for trivial individual amounts each time these benefits are changed. If social security benefits could be excluded from taxation altogether, as in other countries, there would be justification for abolishing age reliefs, and possibly dependent relative relief. Likewise, child allowances against income tax do not benefit the poorest families and could be replaced by direct payments through the existing machinery of the Minister of Social Security.

To this point the inspector shows some community of thought with the sponsors of a 'reverse income tax' which has already been the subject of questions in both Houses of Parliament this year, and also featured in a 'Current Affairs' note on February 5th. He becomes more controversial, however, in his approach to benefits in kind, and whilst he favours abolition of the unwieldy complexities of Form P11D, his suggested alternative is a penal rate of tax on the employer as a disincentive to the provision of such perks. There is perhaps room for as much simplification – and more justice – in raising the starting-point of this discriminatory and thoroughly unpopular form from its present level of £2,000.

Nor will he find favour with our readers in concentrating his reforming zeal on Schedule E on the grounds that 'the more technical Schedule D points . . . are normally negotiated by accountants anyway'.

The smooth implementation of the present rules depends heavily upon the existence of a competent and honourable accountancy profession – and some consideration for its members would not have been misplaced.

New Rules for J.Dip.M.A. Candidates

AFTER completing their final examination there is a strong temptation upon newly qualified accountants to drop everything and relax. The determined minority who pursue postgraduate qualifications may find some comfort in the revised regulations for the Joint Diploma in Management Accounting Services, which incorporate some important amendments.

Whilst the syllabus for the Part I/CMI examination remains unchanged, it may in future be taken in two sessions of two papers each, instead of four papers together. The first two papers may be taken in the year after qualifying, whereas at present the four papers cannot normally be attempted within two years of qualifying.

Candidates who opt to take only two Part I/CMI papers at a time will not be referred if they fail in a single paper, but will be required to take both papers again. (Alternatively, they may then take all four papers at one sitting.) Referral in a single paper, on one subsequent occasion only, will be available to candidates who sit for all four papers together.

The new option will allow colleges more scope in arranging tuition, whether by way of evening classes or short block release courses. It is expected to assist candidates whose business or domestic commitments make it difficult for them to prepare adequately for four papers at a time, and will also allow those who so wish to continue preparing for their first two Part I/CMI papers without breaking the habit of study. For the benefit of overseas candidates, the number of Part I/CMI centres abroad will be increased.

The revised Diploma scheme booklet can be obtained from the Joint Diploma Board at 73 Cheapside (5th floor), London EC2.

The Decimal Ostrich

THE speed of the acceptance and assimilation of decimal currency after February 15th, 1971, will be influenced considerably by the attitude of local authorities, who are amongst the largest employers of labour and the largest purchasers of goods and services in the country. A survey recently undertaken by The Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants, in consultation with the Decimal Currency Board, suggests that serious difficulties are likely to arise in some rural and urban districts.

Replies to the survey questionnaire indicate that within the larger authorities (generally county councils, county boroughs and London) preparations for changing to decimal currency working at D-day, or very shortly thereafter, are already well advanced. Some non-county boroughs appear less well prepared in certain respects, whilst the figures for district councils are disquieting.

Survey replies were received from 359 urban and 299 rural districts – a total of 658 authorities. Over 300 of these had appointed no decimalization officer. Forty had still to arrange conversion of their accounting machines, and a similar number are 'not yet decided' on dates for conversion of internal or external accounting transactions. Perhaps it was one of this group who replied 'Prefer not to think about it until I have to'.

The percentage response to the survey was also noticeably lower from district councils than from all other municipal authorities. No reply was received from 163 out of 522 urban districts, or from 170 out of 469 rural districts. The problems of decimalization will be accentuated if, as seems possible, those authorities who failed to reply include a high proportion of those less well advanced in their preparation.

THIS IS MY LIFE

Check and Counter-check

by An Industrious Accountant

IT was really a matter of trust, when one looked into it. In this particular section of the office, two good young clerks spent a considerable amount of their time entering in careful long-hand such important private ledger items as month-end accruals, apportionments of overheads between departments for costing purposes, depreciation analyses and variances of actual-versus-budget under several headings. These are largely items too responsible to be left to juniors, and unsuitable for mechanization, so they were graded as semi-senior functions.

In view of the importance of the resulting tabulations, the senior in the section called over the entries and spot-checked the calculations regularly. An occasional mistake was discovered and amended, but in the main the results were accepted as beyond suspicion.

So, under pressure from our managing director to reduce manpower, a glimmer of comprehension lightened our traditional darkness. Why, in this modern era of rationalized logic, should we employ A to watch B? If those concerned couldn't be relied upon to do accurately the job they'd done for years, then why shouldn't we get somebody who could be relied upon, and cut out all the calling-over. The whole concept of a senior man spot-checking his junior's arithmetic is ludicrous when analysed. Especially as the auditors repeated the exercise later in the year, thus triplicating the work as well as getting paid for the repetition.

Mind you, I chatted up sundry of my opposite numbers in business locally and found that masses of experienced and able staff spend innumerable hours reappraising their subordinate's handiwork. So much for that vaunted ideology 'full delegation!'

Anyhow, we re-thought the operation and re-organized it with a fairly good pay-off, subsequently telling our auditors on their interim visit. They weren't exactly overjoyed. They didn't applaud our acumen; instead they nattered secretively awhile, then told us that if we relaxed our internal check, they must perforce extend their audit scrutiny to compensate for the weakening in control. And their fees would have to be reviewed. . . .

Naturally, we didn't see it that way at all and some acrimonious exchanges ensued. Looking back on it, I can see their point; but their automatic urge to increase fees struck a wrong note. After all, they weren't paid for piece-work. I wouldn't ask them to cut their fee if they diluted a spot-check because the clerk involved was ultra-conscientious and efficient, to put the case in reverse.

Perhaps what rankled most was the implicit assumption that chaps will become lax, or make more mistakes, – or worse – when not checked. Though this is something of an occupational disease among those whose duty it is to look out for faults in their fellow men.

There was an auditor in my old office, a relic of the good old days, who was reliably reputed to commence an audit by going post-haste on arrival at the client's offices to the cashier's cubby-hole. 'Stand back', he would command with impressive zeal, 'stand back and hand over your keys!'

I mentioned this anecdote to our present auditor, but he heard it with some coldness, more or less hinting that but for such vigilance, dishonesty would have raged unchecked. His own office's 'oldest inhabitant', he related, was wont to say long ago that clients reluctant to produce their bank pass-books on demand were prima facie suspect.

I made the atmosphere icier with the rejoinder that maybe certain auditors lacked the suave diplomacy needed in such delicate approaches. I had always wondered, indeed, why cases of assault and battery were so rare. . . .

Somewhat elated, I advised the MD of a possible reduction of two clerks following overall reorganization, but he merely responded 'Why not four?'

You can't win with dynamic managing directors.

What does the Merchant Banker expect from the Accountant? – I

by CHARLES I. BALL, F.C.A.

THE term 'merchant bank' sometimes causes difficulty in the minds of the public as the business of merchant banks is not always understood. It may be thought either that their activities are so specialized and abstruse that a layman would never become involved or, alternatively, that the merchant bank deals with all business matters, whether the subject be financial, legal, or even concerned with personal affairs. The truth is probably a mean of these two views. The clients, or customers, as they are called in some houses, are mainly companies whose shares are already quoted or are shortly to be quoted on a stock exchange, or individuals with considerable means. In contrast with clearing banks, transactions are comparatively few but large in value, while the number of branch offices can be counted in units rather than in thousands.

2. Many of the older merchant banks started as merchants and this is the origin of their title. As these merchants became bigger and more successful they endorsed the bills of their smaller brethren for a commission and, in due course, the emphasis shifted towards banking. Over a period of years these merchant banks extended their activities as opportunities presented themselves and wherever there was a requirement for their services they developed their expertise accordingly. This accounts for the widespread activities which vary in their importance in each of the individual merchant banks.

3. Seventeen of the merchant banks which have large banking activities are members of the Accepting Houses Committee and there are at present 58 members of the Issuing Houses Association. The latter include all the accepting houses, other smaller banks and also a number of houses whose business is primarily concerned with new issues and mergers of companies. In so far as it is possible to generalize, a broad definition of a merchant bank would include those houses belonging to the Issuing Houses Association although many of them are neither merchants nor banks. This definition is, however, sufficient for the purposes of this paper.

4. The three main activities of the leading banks are banking, investment and company finance. Each of these departments deals with the accounts of companies, but may look at them in a different way.

Banking department

5. The banking department is concerned, inter alia, with taking money on deposit for periods of one day up to several years, although the bulk of the deposits will be for comparatively short periods. The loans, which are to companies in all parts of the world, are also for varying periods. The banking department concentrates its attentions on determining the prospective liquidity of the borrower, i.e., whether the projected cash flow, barring the mistakes and misfortunes which have a habit of upsetting even the best of forecasts, will be sufficient to repay the loan on its agreed repayment date. The ability to pay interest must also be looked for, but this is a secondary feature as companies which make losses, though probably in even greater need of finance, are unlikely to attract the merchant banker. The published accounts and if necessary management accounts will, therefore, be examined to obtain a fair view of the assets, in particular the amounts of debtors and stocks, which will be compared with sales to give the average period of credit allowed and rate of stock turnover. The amounts due to creditors will be looked at to calculate the period of credit taken so that an assessment can be made of the creditors overdue for payment. The most important aspect, however, is the amount of bank and other borrowing and whether security has been given. As a general rule the merchant bank will be unwilling to grant a loan which would rank in point of security behind other bank borrowing.

6. The information needed for all this should be available from any properly prepared set of accounts which will be analysed by the banking department for its particular purpose. Clarity in presentation of the accounts is therefore the main requirement.

Investment department

7. Many of the investment departments of merchant banks supervise investment accounts with a total value of several hundred million pounds. The audited accounts of companies are a major source of information and they are examined from the viewpoint of the investment analyst. The detailed requirements of the analyst are outside the scope of this paper but some aspects where accountants can use their influence are summarized as follows:

- (a) As much information as possible should be disclosed by the company, even if in excess of that required by legislation. The requirements of the stock exchange are generally more extensive than those of the Companies Acts 1948 and 1967, but are not binding on those companies which have not signed the latest form of general undertaking. The secretive approach adopted by some company managements may rebound if a takeover bid is made as investors are likely to welcome the opportunity to change to a more open-minded and progressive management, especially if this can be combined with making a profit on their holdings. Much is made these days of the necessity of keeping employees informed; good shareholder relations are also important. The danger that competitors will benefit from additional information is usually overrated.
- (b) If diversified activities are carried on by the company, the turnover and profits of each division should be shown. The motives for concealment are mixed and may be caused by the wish of the management not to expose an unduly profitable activity to competition or to hide an unsuccessful acquisition. The effect on the analyst is sometimes the opposite to that which is intended.
- (c) The items in the accounts should be set out clearly. At one time the balance sheets themselves contained all the detail and notes were used for exceptional matters. Now the balance sheet tends to be limited to main headings and the notes contain everything that is important. Providing there are suitable cross-references, this may not be a bad thing, but sometimes the notes are so voluminous as to be almost unintelligible. This emphasizes the need for a clear layout of the accounts and notes. Presentation may not strictly lie within the duties of an auditor but his suggestions can be invaluable as there is still room for improvement on this point.
- (d) The accounts of one year should be comparable with previous years. This does present problems where there have been exceptional items or acquisitions and disposals but it is preferable that the company should make its own comparison rather than leave it to each individual shareholder who does not have sufficient information to assess the importance of the relevant items. Although a five- or ten-year record is not yet obligatory, some companies already produce such a table in their accounts. The criteria for dealing with exceptional items might be to adopt the treatment which would be applicable in an accountant's report in a prospectus.
- (e) The earnings per share are not often shown in a table of profits covering a five- or ten-year period but can be extremely useful especially where there have been rights issues, or growth by the acquisition of other companies financed by the issue of equity shares. A substantial increase in profits each year is deceptive if the increase in the number of shares in issue is proportionately greater. This does not prevent some chairmen elaborating on the growth of their companies, which a table of earnings per share would quickly dispel. Complications do arise in making the calculations as the new shares may have been issued at different times in each year but it should not be beyond the capacity of the accountant to produce a fair and reasonable answer.

- (f) Companies in the same industry frequently adopt different accounting bases and this makes it difficult to compare one with another. Although there cannot always be complete uniformity, the advantage of being able to make true comparisons outweighs the loss of flexibility. The construction industry is possibly an extreme example of this where there are many different methods of taking profit on work in progress. Other major problems arise in the treatment of research and development expenditure, depreciation on equipment owned by rental companies and the basis of charging overheads on stock and work in progress. Total uniformity will never be achieved, but it is of great help to investment analysts if an indication is given of how the contentious items have been handled.

Company finance

8. It is on the company finance side, which incorporates new issues and mergers, where merchant banks come into direct contact with accountants. For the purposes of this paper, 'accountants' refers only to practising accountants whether in their capacity as auditors, investigating accountants or tax advisers. Apart from auditing, much of the work of accountants overlaps with that of a merchant bank and a high proportion of the directors and staff of the company finance department are, in fact, qualified accountants.

9. It is interesting first of all to compare the methods of appointment of a merchant bank and of an auditor, both of which are in practice selected by the directors. Although the appointment of the auditor is strictly in the hands of the shareholders, the number of occasions when shareholders have exercised their powers over the directors on this matter is not great. In the case of a merchant bank there is not necessarily any formal appointment, the shareholders are not consulted, and the appointment and duties are not covered by any legislation. The appointment may be for a particular issue or acquisition or may develop into a long-term relationship between the company and the merchant bank, whose different departments can provide a variety of services. For example, the banking department provides short-term funds, including export finance, the investment department may supervise the investments of the client's pension fund and the company finance department is concerned with general financial advice, the raising of long-term funds and will advise and assist in the procedures relating to acquisitions. The large majority of the merchant banks are classified as exempted dealers under the Prevention of Frauds (Investments) Act 1958 which means that documents relating to the purchase and sales of shares can be circulated on behalf of company clients without prior submission to and approval of the Board of Trade. This is one of the reasons why merchant banks are active in the field of acquisitions.

10. A distinction between merchant banks and auditors lies in the ability to be appointed to the board of the client company. Auditors are, of course, ineligible under company law to be so appointed while directors of merchant banks can and frequently are appointed. This helps to strengthen the link between bank and client and ensures that advice is available whenever required although it must be admitted that conflicts can arise when an offer is to be made for, or in opposition to, another client of the bank. Another distinction lies in the freedom of merchant banks to advertise their services. Such advertisements are intended to publicize the name of the bank rather than lead to the direct introduction of new clients, most of which are derived from personal recommendations, many of them from the accountancy profession.

11. There is often a close but indirect relationship between the merchant bank and the auditors and the successful growth of their client is in the interests of both. It is difficult for some clients to know whether certain matters should be referred to their merchant bank or to their auditor, but this presents no problem when the close relationship exists. There is bound to be an overlap in much of the advice given and it is not impossible that some of the bigger firms of accountants might expand their activities towards work now done by company finance departments of merchant banks. The latter, however, have a big advantage in that they can arrange underwriting and cash can be provided on a short- or long-term basis where necessary and the inability to do this would be a big disadvantage to any firm of accountants which set up as advisers. There would also have to be a change in current practice before the Board of Trade granted accountants the status of exempted dealer or licensed dealer. This development cannot, however, be ruled out and would be comparable to the expansion of the accountancy profession into the field of management consulting.

12. The audited accounts provide a merchant bank with the primary basis of information on companies, but it is in the field of investigation leading to new issues and in the forecasts required on acquisitions that the work of the two advisers comes close together. This is covered in greater detail below.

Investigations

13. When a company is introduced to a merchant bank with a view to a quotation of its shares the merchant bank will form an opinion as to whether such a quotation is feasible from an examination of the audited accounts, a quick judgement on the management and an inspection of the factory or other premises operated by the company. If, in principle, the merchant bank is willing to act, it will usually inform the company that it requires an investigation by an independent accountant at the company's expense. The investigating or reporting accountant will be selected by the merchant bank by agreement with the company and will be asked to report to the merchant bank and the company jointly on all aspects of the company and its trading. The purpose of this report, which may take any time between three weeks and three months to prepare and may be of a length of 20 to 100 pages, is to enable the merchant bank to form a better judgement on the company. When a new issue appears the prospective investor may be guided to some extent by the name of the sponsor and the sponsor would, therefore, for his own protection attach great weight to the contents of the report by the investigating accountant. If the report should reveal deficiencies, the sponsor may decline to act or will act only when the deficiencies have been remedied. Another purpose of the report is the assembly in one document of much of the information which will be required at a later stage in the preparation of the actual prospectus. This can, of course, be obtained by the staff of the merchant bank, but the accountants' report avoids duplication of effort and it is more convenient to the company to assemble the information and give the answers to the accountants when the report is being prepared.

Investigating accountants' detailed report

14. This detailed report can be divided into three main sections, namely, information on the company, its profit record and its assets. The items of information will vary according to the nature of the business of the company and additions will be required for specialized industries, but the following will be included in the case of a normal manufacturing company:

- (a) The history of the company and its predecessors. In the case of a family company this would normally go back to the date of the original establishment of the business by a sole trader or partnership, traced through the incorporation of a private company to its conversion to a public company, together with details of changes of name where applicable.
- (b) The nature of the business or businesses carried on by the company and/or its subsidiaries. There may be several different companies each owned by the same family group and although they are not yet in a parent/subsidiary relationship, the report will normally cover all such companies. It is usually undesirable that other activities should be carried on by the same management as there would probably be a conflict of interest between those companies which formed the group and those which were carried on outside.
- (c) Details of capital structure and, if there is more than one class of capital, a summary of the relevant articles in regard to voting, dividend and capital rights.
- (d) A list of the main shareholders, indicating family groups if several families are involved.
- (e) Details of any charges on the assets of the company.
- (f) A list of the directors and the senior executives, giving details of their ages, dates of appointment, qualifications, salaries, pension arrangements and their duties.
- (g) Details of any service agreements in force at all levels of employment, showing salaries, commission on profits, increases provided for in the agreements and expiry dates.
- (h) A list of the properties occupied by the company, giving their situation, tenure, age, area of site, floor area and approximate valuations. The value stated would either be that estimated by the directors or if there has been a recent professional valuation details should be given.
- (i) Details of the employees divided into their various categories with comments on the supply of labour, wage rates, union affiliations and pension schemes.
- (j) A summary of the main suppliers which will indicate whether dependence is placed on any one of them, and also details of long-term contracts for the purchase of raw materials and how the prices are arrived at. This is particularly important when the market prices are subject to substantial fluctuations.
- (k) A list of the main customers, which will show if there is any dependence on individual outlets. Export sales should be given separately.

- (l) Details should be given of the methods of sale, i.e., whether to wholesale or retail outlets; whether delivery is by the company's transport or by outside contractors; whether guarantees are given and for how long a period.
- (m) The size and spread of the order book and whether there are any long-term contracts, particularly if they are at fixed prices.
- (n) Comments on the pricing policy, i.e., whether prices are fixed in relation to costs or whether they are determined by competition.
- (o) A list of the main competitors with the estimated market share of each.
- (p) Particulars of any patents or trade marks held by the company.
- (q) Details of bank facilities, and guarantees given in respect of liabilities of the company or the liabilities of third parties.
- (r) Details of any litigation or claims of material importance pending or threatened against the company.
- (s) Comments on the financial and cost accounting system, in particular as to whether it appears efficient in operation and whether it gives information to management speedily and correctly.
- (t) An opinion on the strengths and weaknesses of the management. Depending on the nature of the comments this may be given verbally to the merchant bank or in a separate report.

15. The next main item concerns an analysis of the profit and loss account for at least the previous ten years or throughout the company's life if shorter. Tables should be shown either in the report or an appendix of the main items of turnover, an analysis of costs, gross profit and net profit, giving in each case percentages on turnover. An examination of this information will indicate any particular variances, and comments should be made on the reasons for them. This is particularly important as it may provide an indication of the extent to which future profits are likely to fluctuate and also whether these fluctuations are within the control of the company or may be caused by external influences. Matters on which special attention should be paid are as follows:

- (a) The procedure for stock-taking and the basis of stock valuations. Over a period of ten years it is likely that the basis may have changed and it will therefore be necessary to examine whether adjustments can be made so that a uniform basis can be applied. The possibility of this will depend to a large extent on the existence or otherwise of detailed stock sheets for the whole period.
- (b) The basis of depreciation of the main items of fixed assets should be given and a comparison made with the written down value for tax purposes. The information required will include the rates of depreciation applied and whether straight line, reducing balance or any other method is used.
- (c) Where possible a statement on current trading should be given. The necessity for this will depend on whether the prospectus is imminent but, in any case, the merchant bank will want to know the company's projections even if they have not yet been verified by the investigating accountant.

16. A summary of the balance sheet at the last year-end should be given with an analysis of the main items. A ten-year summary can be given in the appendix, but comment would not normally be necessary unless there have been substantial changes in any of the particular years. Other matters which can conveniently be grouped with the balance sheet comments are as follows:

- (a) The company's experience of bad debts and the provision at the last year-end.
- (b) Comments on the adequacy of tax provision, including details of the periods where the liabilities have been agreed with the Inland Revenue. If, as is likely, the company is a close company, the position regarding shortfall assessments or clearances should be given.
- (c) Cash flow projections should be given. It is possible that the company will be unable to provide these at this stage, but help should be given to the company to enable it to make its projections on the basis of assumptions which would have to be agreed. The projections should be examined to determine whether they are subject to seasonal influences and also whether the maximum cash requirements are covered by bank facilities.

17. In the preparation of this information the reporting accountants will have to use their own judgement as to the extent it is necessary to carry out retrospectively work equivalent to an audit. A discussion with the company's auditors will have established at an early stage the extent to which the audited accounts can be relied upon and, therefore, the depth of examination required. A verification of the balance sheet assets can be made at this stage, but in many investigations the balance sheet for the following year is likely to be available before publication of the prospectus and the detailed verification can be done then. The report should show the extent to which items in the balance sheet have been examined.

Preparation for an issue

18. On receipt of this lengthy report the merchant bank will inform the company whether it is prepared to sponsor an issue. If the report shows a clean record no problems should arise but in many cases there may be a need for adjustment to the values of stock and work in progress. A change in basis of the valuation of stock may have to be agreed with the Inland Revenue and in a bad case a back duty assessment may arise. Many private companies like to emphasize that their stock is valued very conservatively and unfortunately this conservatism is sometimes carried too far, even to the extent of destroying stock sheets which have disclosed too high a stock value and therefore too large a profit which might be absorbed in surtax. It is unfortunate if the reporting accountant has to find fault with the work done by one of his professional colleagues, but if fault has been found, it must be put right before the merchant bank will sponsor the issue or before the reporting accountant will allow his name to be used in the prospectus.

19. The report will have indicated whether the company is production oriented or sales oriented. The merchant bank may request that a market survey be commissioned to investigate the growth of the market in which the company operates and its prospects of retaining or increasing its share of the market. The information revealed by this vey will be of great value when the paragraph in the prospectus on future prospects is considered by the merchant bank and the accountant.

20. A decision must be made on the capital structure of the company as a basis for the public issue. This may mean reconstruction of a group of companies to bring within the group all the affiliated activities carried on by the management or the shareholders which, for tax reasons, may have been operated in independent companies. If a reconstruction is necessary, the merchant bank will request the accountant to obtain from the Inland Revenue clearance under section 28, Finance Act 1960. It may be necessary to alter the rights of small classes of capital, which would not be suitable for a public company and to make a scrip issue to bring the capital more into line with the assets employed. Finally consideration must be given to the sum which must be raised by the company to enable large overdrafts to be repaid or reduced and to provide for expansion. The prospectus will contain a paragraph stating that having regard to its bank facilities the company has adequate working capital for its present requirements. This statement is made by the directors of the company and the merchant bank has to report separately to the stock exchange thereon. It is therefore essential that subsequent to the issue no further cash is required by the company for at least a year and this should be substantiated by the cash flow projection referred to above.

21. The stock exchange normally requires that a minimum of 35 per cent of the equity share capital shall be held by the public. The shares, which are the subject of the public issue, can be made available either as a new issue to raise money for the company itself or on a sale by the shareholders. If shareholders wish to sell an additional number of shares the minimum of 35 per cent can, of course, be increased. By means of a scrip issue, shareholders are able to sell 'new' shares so that the public can purchase shares free of stamp duty whether they are issued by the company or sold by the shareholders. (To be continued.)

MANAGEMENT INFORMATION

Productivity Appraisal and Measurement

WHEN one of the critical needs of the present time is to increase productivity, a question that is frequently asked is 'How can productivity be measured?' If productivity deals are to be properly assessed, if incentives to staff are to be based upon the right criteria, and if management is to understand the effect of its own decisions upon productivity, then its analysis and measurement becomes of critical importance.

Concepts of earnings, costs and productivity

Management information is frequently presented in the form of a statement of sales value and costs for the period under review, the net of the two being the profit earned. In this situation sales volume is often used as a yardstick of performance. As a corollary the productivity of the organization is measured in terms of the physical output from the plant. Productivity cannot, however, be measured in this way. A motor-car manufacturer who merely assembles parts bought out is not as productive, car for car, as one who manufactures the parts as well as carrying out the assembly operation.

Neither will such concepts measure the earnings available from a given level of turnover to remunerate the resources that the firm itself deploys in the manufacturing process. The higher the proportion of sales income that is paid out to third parties for materials and services supplied, the less will remain for the business to remunerate its own resources. One of the objectives of management should therefore be to maximize the total 'earnings' (T) in relationship to the costs (C), other than materials, etc., (M) which must be purchased from outside sources.

Within the total business framework these relationships can be expressed as:

$$T = S - M \text{ where } S = \text{sales value.}$$

Looking at the cost system these relationships can be further expanded. Where P = profit, CM = contribution margin, and CV = variable costs, then:

$$C + P = S - M$$

$$T = C + P$$

$$T = CM + CV$$

It follows that the more capital intensive the firm becomes, the smaller will be CV and therefore CM will begin to approximate T . To this extent, in such circumstances, the maximization of T will tend to maximize profits.

Earnings and performance targets

Individual performance targets and the incentives that can be offered to meet those targets can be assessed within the context of the need to maximize T . For example, when considering the commission or other incentives offered to salesmen, what is critical is not the sales volume achieved, but the addition that the salesman makes to T .

At other management levels where profit maximization might not be a meaningful target to the person concerned, the earnings concept as described can be used both as a measure of performance achieved and a base upon which to assess the reward to be made. This will provide a realistic basis for the motivation of managers and others at the same time relating it to the objective of improving T and ultimately the productivity of the organization.

Productivity measurement

Productivity is, of course, concerned with more than the maximization of T . It is concerned with the relationship between the output of the organization and the inputs that have to be made to achieve that level. S. Bahiri and H. W. Martin¹ identify eight productivity indexes.

C can be broken down into the following divisions:

C_s = Total system costs

C_d = Total product processing costs

C_e = Cost of productive work

C_f = Fixed costs of facilities occupied

C_u = Fixed costs of facilities occupied plus those idle

C_i = Idle facilities

P can be differentiated as to P_d = Profit generated by products and P_s = System operating profit. Further, that T_d = Total 'earnings' per product or group of products and V = Total variable expenses.

The eight productivity indexes can now be set out as follows:

- (1) Work productivity (E_f) = C_e/C_d
- (2) Product productivity (E_d) = T_d/C_e
- (3) Product earnings (E_{td}) = $T_d/C_d = E_f \times E_d$
- (4) System earnings (E_{ts}) = T_d/C_s
- (5) Product profitability (E_{pd}) = $P_d/C_d = E_{td} - 1$
- (6) System profitability (E_{ps}) = $P_s/C_s = E_{ts} - 1$
- (7) System facilities utilization (E_{cs}) = C_d/C_s
- (8) Fixed facilities utilization (E_{cf}) = C_f/C_u

If one ignores M on the basis that materials purchased do not in themselves generate 'earnings', then the emphasis is rightly laid on the conversion costs as being the sole source of added values to the business.

¹ S. Bahiri and H. W. Martin, 'Productivity Costing and Management', Management International Review, Vol. 10, 1970, pages 55-71.

Relationship between productivity concepts, costs, and break-even analysis

The relationship between the terms used in productivity measurement and conventional cost concepts can be set out as follows:

The values that have been explored so far can now be used to draw up a modified form of the conventional break-even chart as shown in Figure 1.

Since in the chart, as shown, the product system excludes the cost of idle facilities (C_i) which, when deducted from the product profit (P_d), gives the conventional figure for overall profit, it avoids the pitfalls of both the total cost approach and the normal marginal cost approach. Products produced on facilities operating under capacity tend to be priced higher when absorption costing is used not because they required more work done on them but simply because other products were not made. On the other hand, since marginal costing concentrates only on avoidable product costs it ignores the influence on product costs of using capital intensive facilities.

Conclusions

The productivity measurement/costing approach which has been outlined offers a new look right across the spectrum where costs and productivity measurement are involved. Quite apart from linking costing concepts with the economics of the firm they provide a uniform approach to pricing, decision taking generally, valuation, as well as the more conventional aspects of product costing.

Finger-tip Computing

III – Over the Hills

by HAROLD LUCAS, B.Sc.(Econ.), B.Com., A.C.I.S., A.I.S., A.M.B.I.M.

SO far, in these articles¹, we have considered the need for data processing facilities in connection with calculations likely to be of interest to accountants and businessmen. We have assumed that these facilities are available, either with an in-house computer where the various links required will be under the control of the user firm, or with a computer provided by a bureau which rents out its facilities. Let us now consider the second of these two possibilities.

Datel services

The Post Office provides facilities for data transmission under the name of Datel Services. Of particular interest in our present context is the Datel 200 service. This can operate over the ordinary telephone circuits of the public telephone network as well as over private speech circuits. A normal telephone call is set up, using STD to contact the bureau at its appropriate telephone number. After establishing contact the call is switched to the modem and terminal equipment.

The modem, or modulator/demodulator, converts the signals generated by the terminal equipment into transmissible form. The maximum speed is 200 bits (or binary digits) per second. The term baud is sometimes used to indicate this capacity in bits per second. Different Datel services offer different speeds, indicated by the description of the service; for example, Datel 2400 service, over 4-wire private telephone circuits, operates at 2,400 bits per second.

The simplest arrangement is to place the telephone receiver in a special box linked with the teleprinter. Voice contact can also be made by this system, which is shown in outline in Fig. 14. Specialist manufacturers supply approved terminal equipment incorporating input/output, coding and error control functions. This equipment links with standard interface with the PO modems.

A term often encountered in this context is duplex, which implies that data can travel in both directions simultaneously, using two transmission channels. With simplex operation, data can be transmitted in one direction only and this cannot be reversed. With half-duplex data can pass in only one direction at a time but this direction can be reversed, so that linked devices may be either sending or receiving, at the will of the operators.

In connection with the linking of central processors with more than one peripheral device the term multi-plexer is often used. This enables devices such as teleprinters to use the same channel for simultaneous operation. The interface between the central processor and several remote peripherals is made by a communications controller (multi-channel), really, itself a small computer.

With multi-access facilities, especially over the telephone, security problems obviously arise. Various checks are used to prevent unauthorized use of facilities and the retrieval and alteration of data and programs. Each user will have a number which he types out at the appropriate time when he signs on. A check will be made, automatically, that the particular terminal is the correct one from which this number should emanate, using an answer back device. The user number may be in two parts, one for the user company and the second part for the person or department within the company. This is used for the allocation of costs of using the system and protects programs which are stored, since only the 'owner' of a program in storage can permanently alter it.

Costs

The costs of using terminals connected to a time-sharing service can be broken down as follows:

- Terminal costs. Rental, including maintenance, will come to about £400 each year. Equipment may be purchased for about £600, to which will have to be added routine maintenance and regular overhauls.
- Post Office costs. Each modem (Datel 200 service) costs £100 per annum in rental. In addition will be the standard telephone charges. If private speech circuits for the customer's exclusive use are provided the rental per annum will be from £200 per annum for ten miles, to over £2,000 for 200 miles, with a single connection charge.
- Computer costs. These will depend, among other things, on the power of the computer and on whether it is being used at peak periods or not. A charge for connection time, between the user's 'signing on' and 'signing off', is generally made, and may vary from about £3 to £10 per hour or more. Central processing time is generally charged separately at rates in the region of from £100 to £300 per hour. This last charge looks formidable, but the actual cpu time per calculation is generally in seconds or fractions of a second. Terms vary considerably between different companies and must be regarded from the aspects of how the charges are split, how much is charged for each component, how much time will actually be used, what facilities such as programming languages and library programs are available, and how committed will the user be after he has signed the contract. A terminal can be installed within an hour, which may tempt a user to rush in where he would tread cautiously if he were considering purchasing or hiring a computer for use on his own premises.

- Storage costs are charged for data or programs stored on the time-sharing firm's discs or dumped on to its tapes. These costs are based on weekly or monthly storage, say, £1 per track per month for disc storage. Provision is often made that old stored items are automatically cleared after a predetermined time has elapsed unless they have been coded for retention. The storage charges tend to make this system too costly for use for data banks, but these are not our concern in the present context. Programs and data may be stored by the user on, say, paper tape, and these may be input through the terminal as required. The input speed is relatively slow, however, and connection costs will clock up as it is being done.

Practical examples

Fig. 15, based on an actual print-out through a terminal linked with ITT Data Services, is typical of the facilities for calculation offered by time-sharing firms. The reader should note that this example, and the ones that follow, illustrate the use of library programs provided by the time-sharing firms. The illustrations in the previous article were of user-devised programs making use of BASIC compiler facilities.

The number of the service is first dialled and, when the connection has been made, the data button on the phone is pressed and the terminal control knob turned to on-line. The first two lines then print (RTS stands GO appears, followed by >, which always indicates the need for information. We wish to use a library file, so we type /INPUT and this is followed by >, after which we type /INSERT LOAN, LOAN being the code name of the program required. Finally we type /END, and the program is available. To use it we type /XEQ (for execute).

The full name of the program appears, followed by instructions to TYPE THE AMOUNT, which we do, following the > on the next line. The number of years involved and the rate of interest are similarly typed by the user according to the instructions which are automatically printed. The payments information and yearly break-down then appear, and the job is terminated by following the instructions.

The second illustration, Fig. 16, is from the GEIS library and performs DCF calculations of the yield. The print-out is easy to follow, though the use of a continuously calculated discounting rate and the estimation of the double life (in the last three lines) is derived from American practice and may be unfamiliar to British accountants.

Notice that the data input line which, according to the instructions, must start with the line number 10, requires a string of numbers, which are the yearly flows, of which the first, representing the capital investment, has to be shown as negative.

The reader may like to compare this print-out with one shown in the first article, Figs 2 and 3 (July 30th issue). The input is simpler but there is less flexibility in that the flows must be equally spaced, whereas in Fig. 2, it can be seen that flows occurring between years can be accommodated. Generally this would be of minor significance.

The first information printed out relates to the payback period, and the first tabulation shows the cumulative effect of the non-discounted flows. The payback period clearly arises when the cumulative flow is zero, somewhere between the second and third years.

At the option of the user is the print-out for the discounted flows and their cumulative present worth, obviously reaching zero finally if the calculated yield is correct. This option could also be exercised in the other DCF program but this was not done in the version of the print-out shown in Fig. 3. The former program, in addition, calculates the average yearly return, also expressed as a percentage of the amount invested.

Finally, Fig. 17 shows another example included by permission of ITT Data Services. Notice that the balance here is quite different from that in the two instances just quoted, where the output dominates the print-out. In this case the effective output is contained in the fourth line from the end, where the INTEREST PER PERIOD is shown. The extensive print of information on the use of the program could have been avoided by using the NO option after the query WANT INSTRUCTIONS FIRST immediately below the title.

Back Duty Mitigation

by SIDNEY I. SIMON, Barrister

In this article, Mr Simon examines the powers of the Inland Revenue to mitigate or compound penalties and interest in a back duty case, and the manner in which these powers are exercised

IN the Taxes Management Act 1970, section 1 (i), the Commissioners of Inland Revenue are referred to as 'the Board', and a similar reference is used in this article. Back duty mitigation is here considered from five angles:

- (i) Mitigation of penalties (including death).
- (ii) No mitigation of tax.
- (iii) Mitigation of interest.
- (vi) Criminal proceedings.
- (v) The practical aspect.

Statutory authority

The whole of back duty really rests on the Taxes Management Act 1970, section 102 of which provides:

'The Board may in their discretion mitigate any penalty, or stay or compound any proceedings for recovery thereof, and may also, after judgment, further mitigate or entirely remit the penalty.'

The Taxes Management Act 1970 was a consolidating Act, and historically section 102 took its origin from the Income Tax Act 1952, section 500, which derived from the Income Tax Act 1918, section 222. (Both the 1952 Act and the 1918 Act were consolidating Acts.) The purpose of this explanation is that the meaning of section 102 of the Taxes Management Act 1970 has been explained in tax cases on section 222 of the Income Tax Act 1918.

Undoubtedly the Revenue has power to mitigate penalties, and if there were any doubt at all about it, the case of Attorney-General v. Johnstone (5 ATC 730; 10 TC 758) cleared it up. The facts were that Johnstone had incurred penalties under the provisions of the Income Tax Acts for making incorrect returns of his income. In consideration of proceedings not being taken against him, he signed an agreement to pay, in instalments, a sum comprising the tax he ought to have paid plus something for mitigated penalties. He did not pay the last two instalments, and the Attorney-General sued for the balance outstanding under the terms of the agreement.

Judicial recognition of compromise

One point taken for the taxpayer was that the Revenue had no power to 'do a deal', but in the High Court the judge would have none of it, saying:

'It is quite clear, I think, that the section [222 of the Income Tax Act 1918] means that a fine or penalty which the Commissioners honestly think that the facts may support may be compounded by them without taking any proceedings. Therefore I think that point fails. It is a practice that has long been pursued. It is an extremely beneficial and merciful practice to the party, because these parties can always get advice, and if they are people with large incomes, or incomes worth troubling about, they always have advice and they can always get it, and that they should be able to come to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue and put their cards on the table and make an arrangement with them to pay something in respect of the penalties on account of the injustice which they have inflicted on the other taxpayers is, I think, very advantageous to them. The argument this morning was this, that the officials would be bound to take them into Court, just as a policeman is bound to prosecute a man whom he finds committing an offence, and cannot make any arrangement with him outside the police Court. That is what it comes to. I think there is no analogy between the case which has been alluded to and this one. I think the powers of the Commissioners and the powers of those representing them are perfectly clear.'

Similarly in the later case of Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Richards (33 TC 1), penalties had been incurred and they were mitigated. There was an agreement by the taxpayer to pay a sum of money in consideration of penalty proceedings not being taken against him. Once again only a part was paid, and the Board sued for the balance outstanding.

They were successful – as was really to be expected. The following from Croom-Johnson, J (who was the judge in the Richards case just referred to) will be of interest to accountants (at page 2):

'At any rate the income tax payer put his cards on the table, which was very wise of him indeed. I have no doubt at all, from my past experience of this class of case, that this is what the accountants who advised him told him to do.'

Death

In Attorney-General v. Midland Bank Executor and Trustee Co Ltd, as Marsh's Executor (13 ATC 602; 19 TC 136), incorrect returns had been made for many years. Tax and mitigated penalties were agreed, but before all the money had been paid, Mr Marsh died, aged 83. Indeed, the age of the taxpayer was one of the factors that the Revenue seem to have had in mind in arriving at the mitigated penalties. In the High Court, the judge put it this way:

'But this was a long course of wrong statement of income, which was discovered when the matter was investigated, and on this matter Mr Marsh was advised by his accountants. He was a man over 80 years of age and no doubt his memory would not be so good towards the end of his life, but this is a matter which has been going on for very many years and, but for the question of his age, it is quite likely that having regard to the length of time during which the inaccurate returns had been made, quite a different course might have been taken.'

Whilst the liability to tax of a person who has died survives in law against the executors or the administrators of the deceased (see now the Taxes Management Act 1970, section 74) so that in theory death makes no difference, from a practical point of view there may be quite a difference. So far as mitigation is concerned, if a widow is involved and she was not a party to the wrong-doing of the deceased, then her financial position may be one of the circumstances to consider. Authority for that proposition is seen in Dawe's Executrix v. Wallington General Commissioners and Commissioners of Inland Revenue (43 ATC 391; 42 TC 200).

In that case a husband had died on November 5th, 1960. During the seven years to March 31st, 1958, he had sent fraudulent accounts to the Revenue, and he had obstructed an investigation into his affairs by an Inspector of Taxes. The widow was not a party to the fraud and she was the executrix and sole beneficiary under her husband's will. She co-operated with the Revenue and promptly paid a sum of £13,386 out of the estate. That sum was made up of £11,200 tax which the accused had avoided paying plus £2,186 interest. The Revenue claimed penalties not exceeding £21,465 16s. It was admitted that the deceased had acted fraudulently.

The General Commissioners said that if the case had come before them in the lifetime of the deceased they would have awarded the full penalty of £21,465 16s. They also said:

'We considered that we could and should take into account the executrix's position, financial and otherwise, although she claimed entirely through a fraudulent testator. We appreciated that had the testator been less persistent in his fraud and obstruction the offences would have come before us in his lifetime, and we should have had no hesitation (on the facts we heard of what he had done) in awarding the full penalty so that it might be thought inconsistent in that we were mitigating a penalty for a more persistent fraud than for one less persistent, and that the deceased was gaining for his widow an advantage by his calculated obstruction. We looked at the conduct of the deceased and also that of the executrix, his circumstances and hers, his financial position and hers too.'

'In all these circumstances together we felt that the penalty should be mitigated and that a fair and reasonable sum to be imposed as a penalty should be £6,000 which we awarded over the seven years covered by the information pro rata to the maximum penalty for each year as £6,000 is to £21,465 . . .

'This penalty we accordingly imposed.'

The widow appealed on the grounds that the penalty was excessive. She failed in the High Court, the judge holding that there were no grounds for the Court to interfere with the discretion of the General Commissioners. In the course of his judgment he said:

'Where the perpetrator of a fraud is dead, it seems to me that the tribunal considering what is the proper penalty to impose must take into consideration all the existing circumstances, including the fact that the wrongdoer is dead; and in a case such as the present, it appears to me that the Commissioners were right in taking into consideration as they did, amongst other things, the financial position of the appellant.'

And later:

'On the one hand, one has got to consider the gravity of the offence. On the other hand one has got to have some regard to the means of the parties affected to discharge the penalty imposed.'

The judge went on to say that he thought that the penalty fixed by the General Commissioners could properly be regarded as a sensible one, and the course that they adopted in arriving at the penalty could properly be termed a humane course.

Penalties not tax

Under section 102 of the Taxes Management Act 1970 power is given to the Board to mitigate penalties, not to mitigate tax. So, assuming a back duty case (which will depend on the facts, of course) the accountant will first embark on a fact-finding expedition, the object being to find what omission there has been. From that omission (or those omissions) will emerge the underpayment of tax. The Revenue look for the underpayment of tax in full, and it should be emphasized that what has to be paid in a back duty case is all the underpaid tax plus (subject to the facts) mitigated penalties.

Interest

In their calculation of the sum which is finally due to them in a back duty case, the Revenue adds something on for interest, the authority in an appropriate case being section 88 of the Taxes Management Act (formerly section 58 of the Finance Act 1960). However, the present relevance lies in section 88 (4) of the Taxes Management Act which provides:

'The Board may in their discretion mitigate (whether before or after judgment) any interest due under this section and may stay or compound any proceedings for the recovery thereof.'

The Board therefore have the same powers of mitigation in relation to interest as they have in relation to penalties.

Criminal proceedings

Criminal proceedings are very much the exception and not the rule. In by far and away the majority of back duty cases, the Board will settle for a sum of money. After all, a negotiated settlement takes place around a table where there may well be give and take on both sides. In a criminal Court, probable fraud just will not do. There are strict rules and the Revenue has to prove the case. If there is a possibility of criminal proceedings in a bad case, the accountant would do well to get legal assistance. For the rest of this article it will be assumed that the Board will settle for money.

The practical aspect

Immediately the question arises – how much? The answer to that question depends on a number of practical aspects which are:

(a) How did it all start?

For example, was there a voluntary disclosure, or did the Inspector of Taxes have to ferret out the information which he now has? That really leads to:

(b) Was there co-operation with the Revenue?

There may have been all sorts of explanations given, some of which were disproved by the Revenue fairly easily. It all depends on the facts, of course; but familiar explanations advanced are betting winnings, cash hoards, and sales of jewellery and furniture. Generally it goes better with a taxpayer at the final stage if his explanations have stood up to inquiry. The converse is also true.

(c) Culpability

In essence, just what did the taxpayer do? Obviously it is less heinous to leave out receipts than to have a false set of books with fictitious expenses which might also involve wages charged for people who were not employed, or who had been employed but were dead in the relevant years. A penalty loading can be expected accordingly.

(d) Other considerations

Other considerations to be borne in mind are the taxpayer's means, age and health, and whether he is alive or dead. All or any of them could affect the final settlement. And is money being offered in one sum payable right away, or is payment being offered in instalments? The Revenue will be likely to take less if it can see the money rather than have to wait for it bit by bit.

Summary

The Board do have power to mitigate penalties and interest but they have no power to mitigate tax. Most back duty cases reach a financial settlement without criminal proceedings. Although in theory death makes no difference, in practice there may be quite a difference.

Just how much an accountant's client has to pay depends on the facts of the case and a number of practical considerations.

FINANCE AND COMMERCE

First Loss after Fifty Years as a Public Company

AT the recent annual meeting of Whessoe Ltd, the plant engineering group, Lord Erroll of Hale, the company's new chairman, told shareholders that 'a number of painful decisions will have to be taken'. To improve the liquidity position the company may need to sell off some of its assets and research and development may have to be drastically curtailed. A rights issue had been considered but was impracticable.

This is the background against which this week's reprint from the company's accounts needs to be read – extreme pressure on finances during a period of contracting earnings and after a period of major expansion. The previous chairman, Mr John Lord (Lord Erroll was deputy chairman), resigned last April after nine years in the chair during which period the company made two major acquisitions. These changed Whessoe from an organization with works only in Darlington and a branch office in London, to one with numerous works in the UK and overseas.

The primary acquisition was Aiton of Derby, with works also at Sunderland and overseas subsidiaries in Canada, Africa and Australia, and the second and latest acquisition was the Ashmore Benson and Pease South Works which involved expenditure of over £3 million. Last year a shareholding and technical association was bought in Econo-Therm Corporation of the United States, a specialist in heaters and furnaces.

Whessoe World, the company's news sheet, reports in its summer issue on export operations in Canada, France, Brazil, Nigeria, Holland, Bahrain, Dubai, Malawi, Thailand and Singapore.

Slimming process

But Lord Erroll has to open his review with the accounts with the words 'March 1970 marked the end of a bad year for your company. For the first time since becoming a public company 50 years ago we have made a loss.' He went on to describe how over nine years the value of work done by the group had risen from £7 million to £24 million a year and net capital employed from £4 million to £12 million.

After stating that he had been asked by Mr Lord to prepare the review, although Mr Lord had been chairman throughout the financial year, Lord Erroll reported the resignation of Mr Michael Boone from the position of chief executive and from the board, and the appointment of Mr W. Smart as group chief executive from outside the group.

He then recorded the setting up of a cost reduction committee consisting of the executive directors of the board 'charged with examining the entire cost structure of your group and achieving economies wherever possible'. He commented that in a company with a long history it was inevitable that 'situations develop wherein costs which once were justified continue even though the original reason for their existence has disappeared'.

The directors are seeking 'a lean efficient organization capable of meeting competition not simply in the UK but in world markets'. The comments at the annual meeting suggested that the slimming process is going to be severe.

Short of target

It will be seen from the accounts that results of Whessoe Stockton Works are included in the 1969-70 figures, whereas in the previous year they were treated separately, and this has made a considerable difference to group performance. The separate treatment was considered correct during the newly acquired works' build-up period but the level of activity achieved has been insufficient to produce profit and was 'well short of target' even though, at £2.4 million, sales were double the previous years.

The loss of £303,000 is included in the profit and loss account whereas the previous year's loss of £368,000 was set against reserves. But in heavy engineering, all told, there has been 'a welcome improvement in the group order intake' and important inquiries followed by large orders are being received and these are being taken on 'somewhat better terms than before'.

In light engineering the loss-making plastics division was closed during the year and the liquid transfer systems operation was amalgamated with the systems and controls unit. A substantial write-off of stocks and work in progress in this operation was necessary and the light engineering sub-group made its first loss in a number of years.

On general engineering projects, results are dominated by completion of gas plant contracts where the margin between financial success and failure is narrow. The Aiton subsidiary suffered lower profits but there are hopes of new power station contracts.

Shake out

Where the Whessoe troubles lay in the past year is shown in the following table from the directors' report:

The interests of the Group may be divided between the Sub-Groups as follows:

Sub-Groups	Sales		Profit/(Loss)
	1970 £	1969 £	1970 £	1969 £
Heavy Engineering	16,332,244	9,715,429	(79,587)	936,337
Light Engineering	1,568,028	1,472,652	(27,491)	135,807
General Engineering Projects	11,731,952	982,974	237,146	16,981
Precision Engineering	567,896	330,936	44,734	58,825
Aiton	6,702,971	6,201,945	323,077	492,002
	£36,903,091	£18,703,936	£497,879	£1,639,952

The accounts themselves are well presented but shareholders will need to see their content improved a year hence. In a group where long-term orders predominate, recovery – after an earnings shake out – is rarely immediate and usually a matter of long, hard graft.

From an investment point of view, the time to buy the shares of a capital goods company is when the shake out has taken place and when the painful financial surgery has been undertaken.

Potential buyers of Whessoe shares are probably waiting to see the extent of the surgery required. The indication given at the annual meeting suggested that it may be extensive.

Boots' World Sales

IN the report of Boots Pure Drug Co Ltd, group sales are always called, in total, 'World Sales', which is both a correct description and also, presumably, an attempt to persuade readers of the report away from the notion that Boots simply run a chain of chemists' shops.

Boots' UK sales last year were £214 million, an increase of 5.2 per cent on the previous year; exports from the UK rose 17.5 per cent to £4.5 million, and sales by overseas companies 8.9 per cent to £5.6 million. Profits before tax put on 5.6 per cent to £20.2 million. Profits before interest and taxation represented a return of 19.2 per cent on capital employed of £109.9 million, and capital expenditure during the year was as heavy as £8.3 million. That information can be gleaned straight away in the report from 'Group Highlights'.

World sales of £224 million were 5.5 per cent over the combined sales of Boots and Timothy Whites in the previous financial year. Acquisition of Timothy Whites was the main operation covered by the latest report.

Timothy Whites chain was much smaller than Boots and the development accent had been into houseware shops. The result of the acquisition is that Boots are now operating two separate retail chains, each with its own management and methods. At March 31st, the chemist chain under the Boots name had 1,503 branches and the Timothy Whites houseware chain, 193.

Acquisition of Timothy Whites added some 270,000 sq. ft of floor space to the Boots chain and with Boots' own 130,000 sq. ft expansion, the total sales area was increased to 2.6 million sq. ft. The 1970-71 programme should add a further 180,000 sq. ft of sales space.

Standard systems

Acquisition of Timothy Whites has put pressure on the Boots head office administration. The Timothy Whites' headquarters in Leeds were closed and certain key supervisory personnel moved to Boots headquarters at Nottingham. A phased programme of systems standardization is now being implemented to establish a uniform accounting procedure within shops for the ordering and distribution of merchandise.

Transfer of administrative work to computers has continued apace, with significant savings achieved in costs of processing information. Mr Willoughby Norman, Boots' chairman, says 'As the present computers are manned twenty-four hours a day and are fully loaded we will be replacing them with equipment of greater capacity and speed'.

Currently the company is spending nearly £750,000 a year on computer services which extend across the spectrum of ordering and inventory control, payrolls, purchases and sales accounting plus a miscellany of programmes for share registration, shop development and production planning.

For an organization like Boots, decimalization poses considerable problems and in preparation for the change a project team has been preparing and overseeing programmes for staff training, machine conversion or replacement, merchandising pricing and coin handling.

J. Lyons' Wider Spread

THERE are many quoted companies whose shares suffer to some degree in investment status because of a widespread failure by the investing public and by the stock-market itself to appreciate just what the companies do or just how much their role has changed. J. Lyons & Co is a name probably associated in the majority of minds with teashops and Corner Houses. But those two activities are now very much reduced in themselves, and as a proportion of the Lyons total accounted for much less than one-fifth of group turnover and profits last year.

Teashops and Corner Houses are only part of the Lyons catering organization and they, plus hotels – a not inconsiderable factor – accounted for 19 per cent of turnover and 22 per cent of profits in the year to last March, the figures being £29 million and £1,792,000 respectively.

Hotels and catering are incidental to 'the manufacture, distribution and sale of food products'. Under the 'Food Products' heading, turnover in the past year was £113 million (73 per cent of the total) and profits at £5,394,000 were 65 per cent of the total. 'Other activities' accounted for 8 per cent, or £13 million of turnover but for a mere £12,000 of profits, the other contributor to profits being 'Property' with £1,094,000, or 13 per cent.

During the current year the hotel element has been considerably increased by the acquisition of Kingsley Windsor Hotels. This company's ten hotels bring the number of beds in Lyons hotels to over 6,000 and the aim is to double the bed capacity over the next five years in the UK, Ireland and 'other European countries'.

Earlier retirement

The J. Lyons turnover at £155 million was £26 million higher than the previous year with most of the increase lying in the food products area and largely attributable to businesses acquired during the preceding year. The year, Mr Geoffrey Salmon, the chairman, states, was devoted to integrating these acquisitions with existing businesses and they did not in aggregate add to the year's group profits, in fact they reduced it.

Mr Salmon comments: 'We recognize that this is liable to happen when acquisitions are made but we are satisfied that the long-term growth prospects and the present strength of the group justified our decisions in these cases'.

'The process of integration has been a 'formidable task for the management concerned' but it is now almost complete and this should be reflected in higher current year profits.

The directors' report refers to £75,508 net of corporation tax charged to unappropriated profits in respect of the past service element of new pension arrangements for certain directors and senior executives. Mr Salmon in his review says that the pressures under which top management is working have been growing and are already very heavy. They are likely to continue to grow and the directors have decided to make 'reasonable and sensible adjustments' to retirement arrangements in the interests both of the company and the individuals concerned. The age for normal retirement on full pension for all top management, including executive directors, is to be brought forward gradually from 65 to 60.

CITY NOTES

JUST as there seems to be an absence of any lead from the Government in terms of policy on wages and prices, so there is an absence of any lead in the stock-market. The Treasury issue of the short- and medium-dated 'tap' stocks appears to have marked the temporary peak of the gilt-edged recovery and with that sector of the market turning definitely dull, equities have lost ground.

Equities were beginning to take a look at the 350 Financial Times share index mark at one time but thought better of it. Turnover, particularly in the industrial equity market, remains thin and both institutional and private investment interest is extremely small.

At present there seems little prospect of interest being revived. Industrial profits are still under pressure and labour uncertainties make for considerable doubts about the immediate outlook.

Meanwhile there are signs that the traditional 'hedge' of gold shares is being inspected all over again, and even the subject of a higher official gold price is once again being very tentatively mentioned.

BRITISH LEYLAND MOTOR CORPORATION is something more than simply the subject of news stories about unofficial strikes. This week the Corporation announced details of the latest phase in its plan to create a single, integrated group. The latest developments include a reduction in the number of operating units from seven divisions to five and the reorganization of the Austin Morris and Pressed Steel Fisher divisions into one integrated car and body manufacturing organization.

A new special products division is created from the former construction equipment and foundry and general engineering divisions, and British Leyland International has been formed to control the operation of all overseas activities and to co-ordinate activities in the three market areas - Europe, North America and 'Overseas'.

TIME flies and those who are holidaymaking may consider that the time has flown since they were last away. In retrospect, however, time has a peculiar knack of standing still. Can it, for example, really be a whole year since the Pergamon Press affair was at its height?

It not only can, but is. The quotation of Pergamon Press shares was suspended on August 22nd last year - and there is no early sign of the suspension being lifted.

However, the Price Waterhouse report on the company is now completed and is to be considered by the board on Friday of this week. At the meeting, a decision will be taken as to whether the report should be made available to shareholders.

FINDINGS of the test of business opinion taken by Gordon Simmons Research for Charles Barker City Ltd predictably fit the City's post-Election mood. A change of Government putting the Tories in power has produced a better 'feeling'. It would have been surprising indeed had the survey found a major bearish tendency either in actual forecasting or in sentiment.

Most people in the City will say that the new Government 'will get things right eventually', possibly without any shattering confrontation between Government and unions. The confidence factor is still at work in the Government's favour but it will need to be substantiated by one or two pieces of firm evidence before long.

Expectation that it will be so substantiated is reflected in the survey by the majority view that share prices will stand higher at the end of the year than they do now. One hopes that City confidence is proved to be founded on something more than the view that now the Tories are in everything will be all right on the night.

LETTERS

The Future of the Profession

SIR, — The result of the poll of the members of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales is now known and the integration proposals have been defeated decisively. This is the first occasion, we believe, on which members have voted with a full knowledge of the arguments against the proposals as stated in the transcript of the meeting on June 24th, 1970, and the result is that they have given an overall majority against. It is also the first time that there has been a full-scale organized opposition with a circular letter to all members enclosing a proxy to be signed to vote specifically against the proposals. It is quite obvious that even if every single member of the Institute had voted there could never have been the two-thirds majority required to put the proposals through.

We wish to extend our most grateful thanks to many people for the way in which they have helped in achieving this result:

- (1) To all those who voted whether for or against the proposals and proved for perhaps the first time that a large body such as ourselves can stir itself to take a real interest in an important matter.
- (2) To all those who not only voted but took the trouble to read the transcript of the meeting in June and our circular letter of July.
- (3) To those members who made an extra effort by persuading their friends and colleagues in the Institute to vote on this occasion.
- (4) To the secretariat of the Institute who helped in many ways but notably by so promptly seeing that the necessary envelopes addressed to all members both home and overseas were made available to us at short notice.
- (5) To our financial supporters whose great generosity enabled us not to worry too much about the costs of getting in touch with 48,000 odd members.
- (6) To the President of the Institute and many members of the Council who have dealt with the whole matter and particularly our association with it in such a friendly and unacrimonious manner when they might well have taken an entirely different line.
- (7) To the very many members who have written to us expressing their views on the future policy of the Institute. Now the proposals have been defeated we can assure them that we will endeavour to summarize these views and inform the secretary of the Institute of them so that they may be considered by the appropriate authorities.
- (8) To the four little boys and three girls who worked like demons putting circulars and proxies into envelopes, sealing the envelopes and stamping them.
- (9) Lastly, to our wives and secretaries who have obviously had to put up with two somewhat overwrought husbands or bosses, respectively, over quite a long time.

We have to date received contributions of just over £1,450 towards our expenses which will be approximately £2,250. We shall in due course report the overall financial outcome to all concerned.

So far as the future is concerned we are sure that all who have supported us by their votes and by their contributions will join us in doing all we can to help in all proper measures to enhance the standards and standing of our Institute.

Yours faithfully,

HUGH NICHOLSON, F.C.A.
'BRUCE SUTHERLAND, F.C.A.

SIR, — The recent announcement that the members of the English Institute of Chartered Accountants have voted against the integration of the accountancy profession is a sad disappointment to those who have laboured over the years towards this end, and to the hopes and aspirations of those who are convinced of the long-term benefits to be gained. Nevertheless, the path of progress is seldom smooth, nor are causes, however laudable, always easily won.

The profession is now faced with the alternatives of either accepting the status quo or re-examining the present situation to determine what useful action can be considered at this stage. The first alternative seems little better than an admission of defeat and a betrayal of the expectations of students and those recently qualified.

The second alternative prompts the immediate question that as the scheme of integration has been prepared in comprehensive detail, the merger may be allowed to proceed on behalf of those professional bodies that have expressed a majority vote in favour (viz. ACCA, ICWA and IMTA). A merger of this kind would produce a total qualified membership of almost 30,000 and be representative of industry, commerce and the public service, and perhaps lead to the eventual integration of the profession as a whole.

Yours faithfully,

London SW1.

P. H. EDEN, A.I.M.T.A.

SIR, — The crunch vote on integration cast by the members of the English Institute has demonstrated the futility of counting chicks before they are hatched. It has also underscored the native canniness of the Scots in casting a conditional vote for integration.

The members of the English Institute, like the members of the other professional bodies, voted on a bundle of assorted items that included provisions for the 'Future development of the profession' as well as the 'Scheme of integration'.

In voting against integration, have the members of the English Institute also set themselves firmly against the line of development marked out by their Council? That is, against the two-tier profession, the three streams, industrial and public service training contracts, the nine months' full-time course and higher standards of education and training? From Sir Ronald Leach's contention that 'the scheme must be taken as a whole and is a logical combination of interlocking proposals' (The Accountant, July 9th) this would seem to be the position.

Both the members of The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants and of The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants by votes of 97.9 and 80.2 per cent, respectively, have shown a strong preference for integration of the profession. During the debates on the prospect of integration members of both bodies expressed a desire that there should be a fusion of interests by an amalgamation between these two bodies.

So that the prodigious efforts of the past four years may not be wholly wasted, could not the Councils of both the ACCA and ICWA now speedily proceed to the realization of an amalgamation?

There appears to be no lack of goodwill among the generality of the members for such a union and, as the recent vote has shown, it is the members who have the last decisive voice.

Yours faithfully,

D. T. BAILEY,

London W6.

B.SC.(ECON.), F.C.W.A., J.DIP.M.A.

SIR, — I was pleased to learn that the members of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales have rejected the merger proposed by their Council. This decision is in accord with the vote taken by the Scottish Institute a year ago. In certain quarters the vote taken by the Scottish Institute in June 1970 has been regarded as an overwhelming vote in favour of the proposals but this is incorrect. The June 1970 resolution was merely to adopt similar integration proposals if, and only if, the English Institute agreed to the proposed merger.

The interchange of views and the formulation of the proposals has been a tedious task for many leading members and officials of all the accountancy institutes and associations concerned and they deserve the thanks of the members for the services rendered. It has to be hoped that the exercise, having brought the Councils and officials closer together, may bear fruit in other directions.

May I express the hope that the Scottish Institute will now turn to the recommendation of the Dewar Report and, in the light of the further experience gained during the integration discussions, introduce, with as little delay as possible, a 'second-tier' qualification as recommended in the Dewar Report.

Yours truly,

Glasgow C2.

A. D. PATON, C.A.

SIR, — I don't suppose that I am the only person who has felt sick at the result of the Institute's vote.

It would not matter if its Council had produced a scheme which commanded substantial support.

What causes us to burn with a sense of shame and fury is that after years of quietly doing our best, of attempting to preserve and uphold the standards of the profession in which we have sought a living, we have been subjected to several years of denigration, faint praise and abuse by people whom it seemed best not to answer.

Now that it appears that we have suffered this at the hands of people whose Council could not command the support of much more than one in four of their own members, we feel a mockery beyond belief.

For what that Council has done, it must answer, but may it never again subject ordinary people to a public pillory.

Yours faithfully,

ALEX. HARRISON,

Bedworth.

F.A.C.C.A., F.C.I.S.

SIR, — Firstly I should like to offer my congratulations and heartfelt thanks to Messrs Nicholson, Sutherland, Tanfield and others who have helped to avert a disaster.

Secondly, I think the Councils of the Scottish Institute and the Cost Accountants have been rather naughty in not taking a small 'no' for an answer in the first place — they have now to contend with a grand slam.

Finally, I submit that the Royal Charter of the English Institute should be amended, so that if we are ever again threatened with this type of catastrophe, before it descends upon us it will have to be passed either by a two-thirds majority of those entitled to vote (and not merely voting), or by one of 90 per cent of those actually voting.

Yours faithfully,

DAVID KROLL,

Villefranche-sur-Mer.

F.C.A., F.A.C.C.A.

SIR, — I have read, without surprise, that plans to integrate the six major accountancy bodies have foundered.

As long ago as January 1st, 1957, I wrote to the Institute suggesting its Council should consider applications for admission from members of the Association engaged in practice. I stressed that within the Association were many responsible accountants, trained in professional offices, who did their utmost to uphold a very high standard in their practices and who would, if admitted to the Institute, on terms similar to those offered to members of the former Society of Incorporated Accountants, prove themselves worthy of the high traditions of the former body. Since then I have discussed my suggestion with many, including eminent chartered accountants, and the only people to disagree with me so far have been Council members of the Association.

On January 22nd, 1957, the Association published a document which admitted that a scheme of integration would offer some attractions to its practising members, but at the same time would put a large number of those engaged in industry and commerce in danger of becoming regarded as under-qualified.

In the years between 1957 and 1966 I spent much time and a little money in pressing the Association for some action. You, sir, on several occasions have been kind enough to afford me space in The Accountant. I have met senior representatives of the Association collectively and individually. I have even debated the plight of practising members with reigning Presidents, and I and 22 other certified accountants with offices in North Staffordshire have made urgent representations to the Council, all of which appear to have been disregarded.

From time to time chartered accountants have written you suggesting it should be possible to devise a scheme by which professional members of the Association can be absorbed by the Institutes.

Since 1957, and even before, I have been convinced that until professional accountancy is firmly and properly controlled by one body, our present malady will continue and this is an opinion from which I have never deviated.

In fairness to the Association, I and others have taken no steps in any way whatsoever to cause embarrassment to the Council during the period of negotiations from 1966 to date, but now the decision of the Institute has been made known, and the proposals rejected, I feel I can forthwith, and whilst the machinery is available, make an urgent public plea to the Institutes to take a further vote as to whether, in the interests of all properly qualified practising accountants, they should inform the Council of the Association of its willingness to take such certified accountants into its fold.

As I am hardly as young as I was, such a scheme for which I have worked for so long will not now be of benefit to me personally, but as one who has kept to the profession because he has liked it, I am convinced an offer from the Institutes to take-over the professional members of the Association should be made now.

Yours faithfully,

Stoke-on-Trent.

GUY S. PEARCE, F.A.C.C.A.

Unnecessary Jargon

SIR, — Several weeks ago you published a letter of mine in which I complained of the unnecessary use of jargon in the writings of some academic accountants.

Perhaps they can now take fresh heart from the knowledge that they have been joined by the newest arrivals on the industrial campus — the industrial training boards.

While reading a report on my company's training activities by an emissary from the Engineering Industry Training Board, I was a little puzzled to read that we had a 'training retrieval system' and I consulted my dictionary to find out what it was.

The good book told me that to 'retrieve' means to 'find and bring in; recover by searching; regain; rescue'. I was unaware that we had lost our training in the hurly-burly of the day's work, or even that it had missed its way and was in need of help, so I inquired as to the nature of this new beast in our midst.

It seems that the gentleman from the EITB was only talking about our training records!

Yours faithfully,

Harpenden, Herts.

Statistical Sampling

SIR, — I refer to the letter headed 'Statistical sampling' from Mr P. L. Griffiths in your July 30th issue, in which he submits that a statement attributed to me at the Institute of Internal Auditors' Summer School is 'factually incorrect'. I am sorry if I have given offence to Mr Griffiths's mathematical heart through what may have been — to quote the late Sir Winston Churchill — a 'terminological inexactitude'. The important point I made in my talk, which editorial needs prevented including in your report, was that I am not a mathematician. My formal studies of the subject finished, dare I admit it, in 1943 when I left school. So little do I know, in fact, that I was unaware that a statistician was not also a mathematician. Certainly, the masses of formulae in the technical appendices of books on the subject expressed in (to me incomprehensible) Greek letters, gave me the impression that they had something to do with mathematics.

My favourite article on the subject of statistical sampling is entitled 'Simple sampling — how to stop worrying and learn to love statistical tables' by Larry B. Sawyer (The Internal Auditor, July/August 1968). In his article Mr Sawyer says, 'Be an auditor first, a statistician second' and that was my theme at Leicester.

Mr Griffiths quotes from a book written in 1924. May I venture to suggest that what was then regarded as 'experimental' may since have become less so? My own feeling is that books such as Handbook of Sampling for Auditing and Accounting (1963) by Herbert Arkin (who admittedly is Professor of Business Statistics at the Baruch School of Business of the City College of New York) and the Sampling Manual for Auditors (Institute of Internal Auditors 1967, and supplement 1970) result from the solution of the 'mathematical problem' of Professor Coolidge, namely, 'to establish rules which yield correct and valuable results'. I am not suggesting these results are precise, except in defining the extent to which they are imprecise. I am confident, however, that modern techniques of statistical sampling are far more precise than non-statistical sampling used by auditors from time immemorial.

Yours faithfully,

FRANK RIGG, F.C.A.,

President, London Chapter,

Pinner, Middx. INSTITUTE OF INTERNAL AUDITORS.

ACASS REACTION TO INTEGRATION VOTE

COMMENTING on the results of the voting on integration by members of the Institute last Friday, Mr Tony Cross, A.C.A., Chairman of the National Executive Committee of the Association of Chartered Accountant Students' Societies, stated that despite rejection of the scheme they would nonetheless strive to realize all those worth-while proposals in the scheme, especially regarding education, which were of benefit to student chartered accountants.

Furthermore, he said, ACASS hoped that the Institute would actively encourage the adoption of the proposals to improve the standards of education and the facilities offered to students in the profession.

NORTHERN SOCIETY'S NEW CHAIRMAN

MR A. A. E. GLENTON, A.C.A., a partner in Ryecroft Glenton & Co, of Newcastle upon Tyne, was re-elected Chairman of The Northern Chartered Accountant Students' Society for 1970-71 at the Society's recent annual meeting.

Aged 27, Mr Glenton was educated at Merchiston Castle, Edinburgh. He served his articles in Newcastle in 1961 and was subsequently admitted to membership of the Institute in 1965. He then entered articles with a solicitor 'but finding the law as equally straining as accountancy', gave that up after about a year. Mr Glenton worked for Price Waterhouse for a short spell in London and Newcastle, and in 1967 set up in practice in Newcastle.

During his period of articles he confesses to having had nothing to do with the students' society, and thinks he was invited to be chairman last year 'to bring a touch of maturity to the committee'.

Other than 'scribing away steadily from 8.30 a.m. to, on average, 8.30 p.m.', he finds time to serve in the Territorial Army Volunteer Reserve, in which he has been for eight years, and holds the rank of Captain in a Royal Artillery Regiment.

He likes ski-ing in the winter, water ski-ing in the summer and plays quite a lot of squash all the year round. He also looks forward to some shooting when the opportunity arises and is a rifle shot as well, having represented Northumberland and the Territorial Army in the Combined Services Cup at Bisley.

Other officers elected for the ensuing year are:

President: Mr K. J. Hilton, F.C.A.

Secretary: Mr R. P. Cooper, c/o Chapman, Hilton Hutchinson & Dunford, 34 Jesmond Road, Newcastle upon Tyne.

Sports Secretary: Mr H. Cornforth.

CA APPRENTICESHIP GUIDE

A NEW edition of the CA Apprenticeship Guide of The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland is now published and contains details of the three training schemes for membership of the Institute which are in operation; namely, Scheme A for graduates who have studied accountancy in depth for their degrees, Scheme B for other graduates and Scheme C for school-leavers. There is a special section dealing with the preliminary qualification requirements for the Scheme C (school-leaver) apprentice.

The guide is being circulated to all members of the Institute who are training apprentices, to the apprentices themselves, to schools, universities, youth employment officers, careers advisory officers and others. Copies are also available, free of charge, from any local secretary of the Scottish Institute.

SOUTH EASTERN FULL-TIME COURSES

A NINE-MONTH full-time course for articled clerks, sponsored by The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, will start at Brighton Polytechnic on September 28th. Although similar courses are already available at colleges in London and Portsmouth, the course at Brighton will be in a favourable geographical position for members of the South Eastern Chartered Accountant Students' Society.

Full details of the course and of financial assistance to participants may be obtained from Mr P. S. Savage, F.C.A., honorary secretary, South Eastern Society of Chartered Accountants, 12 Marlborough Crescent, Brighton BN1 1WX. Candidates may apply to join the course prior to their obtaining the necessary entrance qualifications, in which case applications should be made in the first instance to the Registrar (Technology), Brighton Polytechnic, Moulsecoomb, Brighton BN2 4GJ. They will then be invited to attend for interview at the college and may be provisionally accepted, subject to their satisfying the entrance requirements as to general educational attainments and their entering into articles before actually joining the course.

BIRMINGHAM STUDENTS LOSE TO SENIORS

IN the past few weeks The Birmingham Chartered Accountant Students' Society have played the senior society at tennis and cricket. Although the students fought hard, neither of the two teams performed well enough to win.

In the cricket match Cowin and Cadman had a good first wicket stand before Cowin was out for the team's highest score of 45, caught by Vickerstaff, bowled Betteridge. The senior society scored steadily and eventually made 194 runs. Betteridge (3 for 25) and Riley (4 for 56) were the best bowlers for the students. The students started badly and lost Whinyates with only 5 on the board. However, Samuda (44) and Walker Roberts (38) saved the situation and the students just fell short of their opponents' total with 178 runs, losing by 17 runs. Ward was the best bowler for the senior society with 5 for 53.

The students 'experimented' with some new players in the tennis match and this did not really pay off. Although David Hare and Robert Lander did not lose all afternoon, the other two pairs failed to win a set, thus the match was lost by 6½ matches to 2½.

HULL'S ANNUAL MATCH WITH SCARBOROUGH

THE annual cricket match between The Chartered Accountant Students' Society of Kingston upon Hull and the Scarborough Branch was played recently at Scalby Cricket Club.

Scarborough opened the batting and after Dickinson's opening over were 1 for 2! However, Sedman (31) and Lloyd (22) put on 60 for the third wicket, and aggressive batting from Goodare and Gill, putting on 24 for the last wicket, meant that Scarborough finished with a respectable score of 99 off 24 overs.

Hull's openers fell cheaply, but then Baxter (43) and Sadofsky (22) between them scored 61 before Sadofsky was bowled. The remaining 7 wickets fell for a mere 18 runs (Dowson taking 6 for 5) and Hull were all out for 94 runs, resulting in Scarborough winning by 5 runs.

A short 10-over match was then played which Hull won by 16 runs. They were 69 for 5 after 10 overs while Scarborough could only score 53 all out off 9.3 overs. Atkinson took 3 for 2 in the last over and narrowly missed a hat-trick.

GOLF COMPETITION

AN enjoyable evening golf competition between members of the Chartered Accountants' Students' Society of Kingston upon Hull was played at the Hessle Golf Club on August 7th, in which 15 competitors took part.

A standard scratch score of 66 was set for the course and Mr Brian Atkinson, F.C.A., A.T.I.L., the Society's chairman, presented prizes to the following:

Best net score: A. R. H. Dales (13)	..	60
Second best: C. R. Palmer (10)	..	70
Third best: T. Atkinson (24)	..	70
Best par 3's total: J. Canby.

BRADFORD v. LIVERPOOL IN THREE MATCHES

THE Liverpool Chartered Accountant Students' Association visited Bradford earlier this month when they played The Bradford and District Chartered Accountant Students' Society at cricket, squash and tennis.

Liverpool won the tennis and squash matches 7-0 and 6-3 respectively, whilst Bradford soundly beat the visitors at cricket by 171 runs.

Bradford were 225 for 6 wickets, David Sunderland scoring 81 runs, not out. Liverpool were all out for 54 runs, Tim Eddison, of Bradford, taking 3 wickets for 6 runs.

Tea and refreshments were served at a local pub afterwards, and both teams informally met Bradford's President, Mr K. M. Gray, F.C.A., and the Vice-President, Mr E. R. Armstrong, F.C.A. A most enjoyable afternoon and evening would not have been possible but for the hard work put in by Bradford's sports secretary, John Brearton.

A QUARTER OF MINTS

'ROUNDABOUT' was amused by Nigel Law's lines in the current issue of View, the periodic bulletin of Birmingham CASS:

THE ARTICLED TICK, TOCK, CLOCK CLERK

Tick, tick,
Tock, tock,
Clock, clock,
Clerk, clerk,
Articled tick, tock, clock, clerk,
Working all day
For the lousiest pay,
Dreams of a rise,
No more pork pies,
For lunch, munch, munch.
Here comes the crunch:
'When I was a clerk',
Said the Principal's bark,
'I got a pound a week,
All I could eat
Was a quarter of mints
Between ticking stints'.

Tick, tick,
Tock, tock,
Clock, clock,
Clerk, clerk,
Articled tick, tock, clock, clerk,
Walked out in disgust,
Kicked at the rust
On the E-type wings,
Fingered the dints,
Walked to the shop,
Bought a quarter of mints.

Nigel Law.

Mechanized Accounting Demonstration. As a result of views expressed by members of the London Chartered Accountant Students' Society who attended the two-day course on mechanized accounting and electronic data processing held last January, the Committee recently arranged a visit to the offices of the National Cash Register Co Ltd. Our picture shows some of the members who attended and saw practical demonstrations of equipment mentioned during the January course.

The demonstrations ranged from OCR and magnetic tape data preparation units, to electronic invoicing and accounting machines, magnetic ledger card systems, visible record computers and the Century computer. The visit was not limited to those who attended the course and it is pleasing to record that there was a very large number of applicants, who had to be accompanied in 'shifts'.

The series was well received at the time of its showing on television and it is felt that the films will be particularly interesting and useful to students to supplement their courses. Each film has a running time of 30 minutes.

The films are available for sale or hire from Sound Services Ltd, Kingston Road, Merton Park, London SW19. The purchase price is £100 for individual films and £750 for the complete set of ten films. HOCKEY

In their final summer match, the Chartered Accountants' Hockey Club beat the Bank of England by three goals to nil.

Although missing a penalty flick early in the game, the Accountants dominated the match and might well have scored more. Perry and Major were a constantly threatening combination on the right and Gallant and Russell-Smith did much good approach work down the left. The first goal was shortly before half-time from a solo run by Perry.

Two further goals were scored in the second half by Perry and Gallant. Willetts, Carr and Gallico had the opposition attack under control and Morrison had a quiet evening in the Accountants' goal.

COMPANIES IN 1969

New companies registered in 1969 numbered 25,154 - an increase of 4,500 on the total for the previous year - according to the annual report on 'Companies in 1969' published this week by the Board of Trade (HMSO, price 4s 6d). Nearly all the registrations were of private companies. The total number of companies on the registers is now almost 552,800, of which over 536,000 are private companies.

During the year, 25,751 companies were dissolved or struck off the register and winding-up proceedings were begun in 9,020 cases, of which 1,247 were compulsory liquidations.

The report also gives information about some of the responsibilities of the Board of Trade under the Companies Acts 1948 to 1967 and reference is made to the Board's powers to investigate the affairs of companies and to prosecutions by the Board. The report includes a list of the companies which have satisfied the Board that they should be treated for the purposes of Schedule 8 to the 1948 Act as banking or discount companies.

The Companies Registration Office received some 990,000 documents for filing during the year, and there were some 1,325,000 public inspections of files.

Making

with high speed voice contact for staff location, message relaying, announcements, time control – it's all Pye's business. And Pye handle it all.

Pye study your problem.

Pye plan the solution.

Pye assemble the equipment you need.

Pye install it.

Pye maintain it.

Pye have been doing all this for many of Britain's top companies for years.

And, this year, many of them are asking for the new Philips intercom.

The M100. The most advanced inter-office system of communication. It's all push button. Faster. And you can have a two-way conversation without the fiddle of a talk/listen switch. The supply is fully solid state – there are no troublesome relays or selectors to wear out. Small, compact, with exceptionally low interference, the basic model provides up to 100 stations.

The M100 is just one possible part of an overall system. Perhaps an efficient Pye conference unit. Or a Pye system for giving alarms or making announcements.
Or one or any of all of these.

Opening up on Statistics

ONE of the more disappointing aspects of the controversy, discussed in the article 'Pro Forma' in last week's issue, surrounding government demands for statistical information from business undertakings, has been the absence of any consideration of the uses to which the resultant data may be put. The impression among the business community generally is that the statistics may be of some value to government departments, but none to the business community which has to provide them.

It is unfortunate that neither the government departments nor industrial associations have publicized the beneficial commercial applications of a good deal of such data. Nor has the Central Statistical Office been helpful in this matter, although it is deeply involved in interpreting the same data for Ministers and departments. With the recent creation of the Business Statistics Office it is to be hoped that a more positive approach to this educational aspect of official statistics will be adopted.

Indeed, there is a hint of this in an article in the current issue of Statistical News (No. 10, HMSO, 6s) entitled 'Confidentiality of Business Statistics'. The authorship of the article alone testifies to the importance attached to this subject, for it is by no less than the Director of the BSO, Mr M. C. Fessey, and the Chief Statistician, Mr H. E. Browning. Its declared purpose - which has the blessing of the Statistics Working Party of the Confederation of British Industry - is 'to encourage public discussion of the problems of confidentiality and disclosure'.

A large volume of important information relating to all aspects of the economy, not least concerning manufacturing and distribution in the private sector, comes into the hands of government statisticians. Much, but not all, of it is published, often after long delays and not always in the most useful form, for those in private industry who may wish to use the data.

The Board of Trade, in particular, and other departments, too, are often prepared to provide information additional to that published; sometimes even to the extent of a more detailed analysis of particular tables. The factor limiting the dissemination of some valuable information is the prohibition of disclosure by the department collecting it, where it may be possible to identify the source and relate the data to an individual person or undertaking.

Such a statutory prohibition is, of course, understandable; collection of statistical information would be even more difficult if the firms providing it could not rely upon official secrecy and the protection of their interests.

Nevertheless, as the need for more market research, economic analyses, and studies in depth of particular sectors of the economy grows, so government departments, and more especially the Business Statistics Office, may be faced with an increasing number of requests for data which must be treated as confidential. Such requests, note the writers of the article, may come from 'industry, commerce, local authorities and planning authorities as well as those engaged in research into economic and social questions', such as for example, the National Board for Prices and Incomes, Industrial Training Boards and trades associations.

The information requested may comprise a breakdown of regional shopping facilities; lists of major producers of a particular commodity; lists of distribution outlets in an area to serve as a sampling frame for a research study. In view of the present restrictions, the BSO can do little more than offer indirect help in meeting such requests by supporting an appeal for the information to the firms affected. Yet if the present policy towards confidentiality were to be eased, state the authors, then it would enable 'greater use of the information currently collected by other bodies'; it would 'reduce duplication of inquiries' as well as making possible 'the quicker publication of detailed figures'. These are obvious and significant advantages which must, as the article concedes, be set against the interests of those affected.

It would be all too easy for the average businessman to reject such appeals as infringing the promise of confidentiality and therefore unjustified. What has to be remembered is that industry and commerce will also benefit from some easing of the rules and it would be a short-sighted policy, indeed, to refuse even to discuss with the BSO the best means of overcoming the difficulties if there is a chance that they can be resolved.

Pergamon Countdown

PERHAPS the most tantalizing thing for a press commentator is the fact that a story is about to break, but it is just outside his deadline. While he is now largely in the dark, by the time his article appears all will have been revealed.

This is the situation as we go to press; the Price Waterhouse report on the Pergamon affair comes out this week, but as we write there is only the published letter which Mr Robert Maxwell, the ex-chairman of Pergamon Press, sent at the end of last week to his successor, Sir Henry d'Avigdor-Goldsmid.

It was not to be expected that Mr Maxwell would reveal much, but he did raise the curtain far enough for us to glimpse the setting in which the final scene of the Leasco/Pergamon bid drama will be played out.

It appears that the Pergamon 'revised' pre-tax profit for 1968 has once again been halved. Starting from an original audited figure of £2.1 million, it was reduced to an estimated £1.09 million at the time of Price Waterhouse's interim report last March (The Accountant, March 12th), and is now further downgraded to £495,000 (of which £355,000 is pre-tax profit resulting from sales of back issues to Maxwell Scientific International Inc.), though for the succeeding nine-months trading period to September 30th, 1969, the draft accounts apparently show a profit of no more than £29,000.

However, all this is incidental to the substance of the letter which was to make representations on a number of topics on behalf of the shareholders. Mr Maxwell contended that shareholders could be victimized by Leasco 'on the basis of figures in the accounts which I regard as farcically low'. The points raised range from vague references to 'errors in calculations and conclusions' to the treatment of balances due to MSI, the apportionment of ILSC losses and, not least, changes in accountancy practice – all part of the interminable wordy battle which has been going on since August 1969.

Now the Price Waterhouse report has been published, presumably the ball will pass firmly into Leasco's court; for that company promised to put in a take-over bid for the shares it does not own within 60 days of publication. At present, Leasco owns 38 per cent of the shares, Robert Maxwell and family trusts 28 per cent, the institutions (who are acting in concert in this affair) another 20 per cent, and the remainder is in the hands of the long-suffering public – still awaiting the restoration of the share quotation suspended over a year ago.

Although the full report (of which more next week) is now released, the 1970 profit forecast will not be ready until nearer the time of the annual general meeting in September. The climax of the story will come, however, with the publication of the report of the Board of Trade inspectors, one of whom is, of course, Sir Ronald Leach, C.B.E., F.C.A.

Current Affairs

Accounting for Inflation

Accounting under conditions of an 'acceptable' rate of inflation has been a matter of debate for years. Accounting under current conditions of 'critical inflation' is now, according to Mr A. F. McDonald, D.L., C.A., chairman of The Distillers Company, a matter for action.

In his statement with the company's 1969-70 accounts issued this week, Mr McDonald says: 'Having regard to the wage explosion we have experienced in this country during the first half of 1970 of which the full effect will not be apparent for some time, it may be questionable by the end of the current fiscal year whether British industry can look upon the orthodox methods of accounting hitherto adopted in this country as providing a reasonable means of ascertaining profit.'

This, Mr McDonald continues, 'is a matter which will have to be studied seriously by industry and the professional accounting bodies' and will 'also require close examination by Her Majesty's Government. If the real capital of British industry is to be maintained, greater retentions of so-called profit will be necessary and the collection of taxes upon profits, including corporation tax, under a system which takes no account of the realities of the situation must be reviewed'.

It is the matter of degree that conditions any debate concerning changing trends. Historic versus replacement values is a matter for debate all the time the difference between those two values is reasonably acceptable in an annual accounting period. But when, as now, prices and costs are rising on an unprecedented scale and there is no apparent prospect of the escalation being checked, the debate must take on a greater sense of urgency. As Mr McDonald intimates, the matter cannot be confined to debate within the accountancy profession; national economic policy is a vital factor.

Mr McDonald may possibly be overstating the case in order to make his point, but the end of the current fiscal year is seven months away and seven months' inflation at the present rate could have material effect on industrial costs; dangerously so in the case of companies unable to raise their own prices quickly enough.

BOAC's Profits and Problems

WE are not a drain on the taxpayer but a contributor', said Mr Derek Glover, C.B.E., F.C.A., financial director of BOAC, commenting last week on the Corporation's recent annual report. In other words the Corporation pays dividends and tax to its sole shareholder, the British Government. However, although provision has been made in the accounts for both these commitments, provisional tax computations indicate that no liability for payment of UK corporation tax will arise because of substantial tax losses brought forward.

When this is considered in the light of the financial reconstruction under the Air Corporation Act 1966 when £79.9 million of losses were written off, some might be tempted to think that BOAC was getting undue advantages and has had every encouragement in attaining its present healthy condition. Nevertheless, the management believe the turn-round is entirely due to efficiency of operation and that even if no reshaping had taken place, the Corporation's profit during the subsequent five years would have been sufficient both to pay appropriate interest on capital and loans provided by the Government and to eliminate the losses accumulated to March 31st, 1965.

Unquestionably, profits have been allocated very prudently to reserves for such contingencies as insurance and fleet replacement. Amortization of assets is at a faster rate than is the case with other airlines: Pan-American, for example, obsolesce over 18 years, BOAC over 12 years.

A problem that has to be solved is that of fares and empty seats. As any prospective passenger can cancel a booking at will there is a resultant loss of revenue because cancellations are so often made too close to take-off time for a re-allocation of seats to be possible. This partially explains why there are many empty seats on planes today and could well lead to a non-returnable deposit-on-booking system.

Overseas Investment Market

AS from August 19th, transactions involving the purchase and sale of property outside the sterling area will no longer be channelled through the property currency market but through the investment currency market. In other words, the separate property currency market established in April 1965 to reinforce the control on residents' capital transactions in overseas property has come to an end.

The consent of the Bank of England is required before the foreign currency proceeds of any such sale of property may be sold in the investment currency market. Where the proceeds are from the disposal of the whole of a property held for private use, the vendor will no longer be subject to the requirement that he convert 25 per cent of the proceeds into sterling at the official exchange rate.

While exchange control permission is still needed for all payments in connection with overseas property transactions, this modest easing of the regulations will provide a larger market, i.e., the investment currency market, within which property deals can take place without generating wide fluctuations in the premium payable for property currency. To this extent, UK residents may expect to acquire property at less cost than before.

The effect of this change in financing procedure will leave the reserves unaffected. Although in the past this insulation of the reserves has been achieved primarily by matching purchases and sales of overseas property, the transactions involved are so small in the aggregate that the investment currency market should be unaffected. It is to be hoped that this tiny concession marks the beginning of a systematic dismantling of the whole apparatus of exchange control which is incompatible with the status of sterling as long as it claims to be an international currency. One fears, however, that this is a forlorn hope.

Inland Revenue Computer Problems

IT is now being realized that a computer is not necessarily the answer to everybody's problem. A survey by The Observer has suggested that over 40 per cent of British computer installations are badly run, and no doubt other organizations could match the reported experience of the Hamlyn Group that 'our computer services are no longer troublesome, but remain unacceptably expensive'.

One installation with a particularly unfortunate history has been the Inland Revenue's 'Centre 1' at East Kilbride - described earlier this year by Sir Gerald Nabarro, M.P., as 'an incompetent machine which takes months to achieve the wrong answer'. Although this imputation was dismissed indignantly as 'a gross distortion' by a spokesman for the Inland Revenue Staff Federation, it is admitted that the staff of this centre have met problems and that some 'tremendous difficulties' have been overcome. The staff are now consolidating their knowledge and experience, and are confident of giving within a year a better service than any other tax office in the country.

The official side of the Whitley Council has given an assurance that the lessons learned at East Kilbride will not be forgotten. Meanwhile the IRSF is awaiting with interest the results of a questionnaire dealing with staff morale and management services at the centre.

Finance Houses New Interest Rate

AS announced last week, Bank rate is no longer to be the automatic key to all other interest rates in the London money market. As from September 1st, the 'Finance House Base Rate' will be included regularly, with other money market rates, under 'Rates and Prices' in The Accountant.

Over the past three years, the cost of money to finance houses has been more closely reflected by the inter-bank 'three months' rate, which fluctuates on a daily basis by fractions down to $\frac{1}{16}$ of 1 per cent, than by Bank rate itself which moves relatively infrequently and by steps of not less than $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. At the end of 1967, the inter-bank three months' rate stood briefly below Bank rate of 8 per cent, and then coincided with it; since January 1968, movements in the three months' rate have reflected Bank rate only in the most general way, the margin between the two rates varying from $\frac{1}{8}$ of 1 per cent to over 2 per cent.

A weekly average of the inter-bank three months' rate will be calculated as at 11 a.m. each day, and the 'Finance House Base Rate' ascertained on the last business day of each month by averaging the last eight weekly figures. The rate so calculated will be effective from the first business day of the following month.

Professional Co-operation

THE circumstances of life in Britain today are likely to lead to an increase both in the number of people requiring professional advice and in the complexity and sophistication of that advice. Writing in a recent issue of The New Law Journal, Mr David Hunter, President of the Council of Associated Stock Exchanges, makes a particular plea for closer relations between solicitors and stockbrokers to match the new requirements of their clients.

Relations between solicitors and members of other professions have been debated at the Law Society's last two annual conferences and attracted previous comment in The Accountant for January 4th and December 4th, 1969. At present there is nothing to prevent any solicitor, accountant or stockbroker from recommending his client to take the advice of another profession in appropriate circumstances, and Mr Hunter's paper is directed predominantly to reminding solicitors of the services which a stockbroker can provide, and the availability of stockbrokers' offices in most major cities.

Joint partnerships between members of different professions are, however, a different matter, and pose several legal and ethical problems to which a solution is not yet in sight. These include the practical difficulties of partners trained in different disciplines accepting legal responsibility for one another's actions, a possible loss of professional independence, and the Law Society's understandable concern for the present privileged position of solicitors.

Accountants and the Arts

THE alternative views of accountancy as an art or a science each have their protagonists; not many members of the profession, however, would consider there was any close association between accounting and the arts. But, Mr Anthony Field, J.P., F.C.A., accountant to The Arts Council of Great Britain, tells us, 'accountancy is a subject which forms a major part of the syllabus of the present Polytechnic course for training arts administrators, alongside ancillary subjects such as economics, statistics, budgetary control, etc.'

He knows, moreover, that 'chartered accountants are employed by Covent Garden, Sadler's Wells, the National Theatre, the Hallé Orchestra, and the theatres at Exeter, Oxford, Greenwich, and Stoke-on-Trent'. There is also a chartered accountant lecturing on the Polytechnic course apart from himself.

Mr Field passes on this information in bringing to our attention the committee of inquiry recently set up by The Arts Council to investigate present arrangements for training arts administrators. The inquiry is to assess the effectiveness of past courses (not only the course currently being run at the Polytechnic School of Management Studies, but also other courses which may be in existence in universities or colleges of further education; and to make recommendations for the future.

The committee will welcome information about any courses running or proposed, as well as written evidence about the subject generally. Knowledge or experience within the competence of overseas readers would doubtless be of particular value to the committee whose address is c/o The Arts Council of Great Britain, 105 Piccadilly, London W1.

THIS IS MY LIFE

True and Fair

by An Industrious Accountant

OUR maintenance engineer, who also has a watching brief over extensions to our buildings, entered my room with a winning smile which only partly concealed an underlying determination to get his own way. 'I'm in a spot of trouble', he announced, 'and I'm hoping your chaps can help me. The boss is hopping mad about the new wing figures.'

His problem was not unexpected. The final costs for construction of our latest extension had come out about £42,000 over the original budgeted figure – a result forecast with reasonable accuracy by my department for some weeks, but pooh-poohed by our worthy engineer. There were some final adjustments to be made, he indicated loftily; he'd let us have details later.

Engineers always play their cards close to their chests until they see how the cat jumps, so to speak.

He spread a sheet of figures on the desk with an injured air. 'Look, your chaps have included all the costs of demolition and clearance, including the levelling of the old ramps – even the extension to the sprinkler system', he said. 'They weren't meant to be included. You can't capitalize the demolition costs; they'll have to go against revenue.'

It was just as well that I could produce my notes of the original discussion when his boss, the deputy-chairman, had specifically referred to 'demolition and such-like costs'. It was there in black and white. It wasn't mentioned in his official write-up, asserted the engineer; but I pointed out that on our part we had assumed it to be covered in 'sundry general charges'. Admittedly, nobody had itemized the sprinklers, but we thought that surely they'd been included in paragraph 14 (b): water and electricity extensions.

The engineer thought not, and after further marked lack of unanimity he shifted his ground cunningly. 'Let's come clean', he said, 'the boss talks loosely when he gets away from his script, and even if he did mention the extensions, as you say . . . okay, okay, let's admit he did, maybe . . . well, he didn't mean to and he shouldn't have. But if you insist on this accountancy penny-pinching, there'll be hell to pay at the board meeting. And I'll get it in the neck, too, for not straightening out the old fool in time. You really can't do that to me!'

The change from factual justice to humble pleading took me aback somewhat; then I recalled the historical precedent as recorded by Pepys, who has precedents for every sort of malfeasance.

He told of the Duke of York, later King James II, 'whose family is in horrible disorder by being in debt by spending above £60,000 per annum, when he hath not £40,000 . . . that at a certain time Mr Povy did carry to him [the Duke's father-in-law, the Lord Chancellor] an account of the state of the Duke's estate, showing in faithfulness how he spent more than his estate would bear, and asked my Lord's opinion of it; to which my Lord replied that no man that loved the King or Kingdom durst own the writing of that letter; at which Mr Povy was startled, and reckoned himself undone for this good service'.

The anecdote shows the folly of accountants disclosing their financial misdoings to the friends of men in high places, but Povy went boldly with his letter to the Commissioners who regulated the Duke's affairs. Those men 'read, examined and approved of it . . . and signed it, and gave it to the Duke'.

So I let our figures go unchanged to the directors, who gave hell to the deputy-chairman – and high time, too; he's been riding for a fall long enough.

The Accountant's Contribution to Profitability

by I. N. SLEETH, A.A.S.A.

Are you an accountant suffering from an inferiority complex? Has some other member of your organization made a derogatory remark about your function?

Did the production manager call you a 'score-keeper' — a recorder of past events and therefore of little use to the productive capacities of the company? If these remarks have been heard in the corridors of your firm, then perhaps you are not fulfilling the effective and useful role that is possible of an accountant. What are the areas in which an accountant may shake off the stigma of 'an historian' and make a vital contribution towards the profitability of an organization?

The writer of this article — a member of the Australian Society of Accountants — offers some thoughts on these points as he returns home after a spell working in London.

A WIDESPREAD awareness of the vital role of the management accountant has emerged in recent years and it is this area which I wish to examine first. As the name implies, the management accountant is primarily concerned with reporting to management on the operation of the company.

His duties cover a wide field and essentially must be flexible enough to adapt to the circumstances in which he finds himself. By the skilful construction and use of an effective costing system it should be possible to provide information which will form the basis upon which management decisions are made. Some obvious examples of his usefulness are referred to in this article.

Budgeting

No organization can expect to operate successfully without planning for the future. The compilation of budgets and forecasts is an integral part of effective planning, and in this area the accountant plays an important role.

A yearly budget should form part of a long-range plan concerning the profit objectives of the company. Primarily this should be geared towards providing the shareholders with an adequate return on the 'risk capital' which they have provided.

Once this objective has been formulated it should then be related to each year's operation and form the basis for statistics used in the budget structure. These could be as follows:

- (a) Net profit as a percentage of turnover.
- (b) Net profit as a percentage of funds employed.
- (c) Profit contribution of each division.
- (d) Profit contribution of each product.

(e) Stock and debtor ratios.

(f) Additional funds required.

This information must then be fed to those with divisional and functional responsibility. The accountant should be able to contribute of his financial expertise to ensure both that these objectives are realistic and that short-term budgets fit into the long-range plan.

It is not suggested — nor can it be expected — that an accountant does all the crystal-ball gazing and produces a budget single handed. One looks towards the marketing and production departments for data concerning sales and production, respectively, and to other departmental managers for expenditure and revenue under their control.

Nevertheless, the accountant is normally responsible for obtaining this information, fitting it together and seeing it forms part of the overall plan. Often his knowledge of budgeting techniques will be called upon by other members of the management team.

He will also give certain guidelines and pinpoint areas which need revision. For example, a sales budget may reflect an expected growth of 10 per cent over the previous year, but an expenditure budget for the marketing department shows concurrently an increase of 20 per cent. This would obviously require further investigation to ascertain if such an increase was justified.

The paramount reason for budgeting is to provide a yardstick for actual performance. This performance should be dissected into the various areas of functional management. This not only gives an indication of the achievement of each function of the business but also provides valuable incentive to those in control. The efficiency with which an accountant submits progressive reports to management in this regard will decide what value can be drawn from the budget.

Costing

The many costing systems which may be implemented probably provide the most important field for the accountant to boast of his contribution to profitability. Naturally it depends on the type of operation in deciding what system will produce the most beneficial information for management.

Whatever the method, it should be possible to use the information, thus obtained, as a basis for reporting on:

- (i) areas which are lucrative and warrant further attention;
- (ii) trouble spots which require investigation and, where possible, rectification.

The scope is vast and it is not intended to provide an exhaustive list of the uses to which the various costing methods may be applied. Perhaps one or two examples will indicate the potential:

- (a) Where a standard costing system is in operation, it enables the accountant to isolate rapidly the reasons for any diminution in profits due to an increase in costs. It may be due to a slackening of efficiency, abnormal wastage of raw materials, unfavourable buying prices or excessive overheads. The important factor is that the cause may be diagnosed quickly and remedial action taken.
- (b) If direct costing has been implemented, valuable information is available to those responsible for marketing. With the added tool of a break-even analysis, the accountant is able to assess products in light of their contribution to overheads. In a multi-product organization this information is vital in the formulation of pricing policies.

At a time when 'export' is the magic word, the use of direct costing has become very important in the pricing of products to compete in international markets.

- (c) In the type of operation where manufacturing is carried out on a 'made to order' basis, it is probable that job costing is the accountant's source of information. This would apply to an engineering concern where each project could vary considerably in size and complexity.

If charges to the client are calculated by taking actual cost plus margin, then job costing is essential for preparation of invoices. On the other hand, if firm quotations are issued, the knowledge of profit per job must be readily available to indicate if quotations are too low. The winning of substantial orders may be of no avail if the price agreed does not produce a satisfactory margin. In this area, job costing is invaluable.

- (d) The question of productive capacity is extremely important and the accountant must take care to keep management fully informed in this regard. Idle capacity can have a very significant bearing on profits and an accountant must be able to report on this matter both accurately and regularly. He must indicate not only current idle capacity but, with reference to the forward order position, estimate what the future utilization of capacity is likely to be.

One important factor for the management accountant to bear in mind is that a costing system is useless unless it is producing valuable information. Furthermore, this information must be presented promptly and clearly to management to enable the right decision to be made.

An accountant may doubt whether his reams of monthly statements and reports are being studied and used by their recipients. If such doubts are well founded, it could be because they are presented in a manner easily interpreted by an accountant, but very confusing to a non-numerate engineer or salesman.

So much for the management accountant. What about the financial accountant? Does he also have opportunities to contribute towards the maximization of profits? Let us consider some examples which will indicate an affirmative answer to this question.

Cash policy

Many companies have not learned to utilize their cash resources effectively. An effective financial accountant will prove the adage that 'money makes money'. Cash must not be permitted to lie dormant, earning an unsatisfactory return.

By the use of skilful planning techniques involving a careful cash-flow analysis, an accountant must be able to estimate what amounts will be available for investment and over what period. An assessment will then be possible of the various investment opportunities available. Their comparative merits as to rate of return, risk and other factors must be investigated and form the basis of recommendations to management.

Working capital

Savings can often be achieved by a close examination of ways to reduce working capital requirements. Funds may be unnecessarily tied up in such items as stock and debtors when they could be far more profitably applied elsewhere. This takes on added importance when interest rates are high and credit difficult to obtain.

A rigid collection policy must be in force to ensure that credit is not extended to debtors beyond a reasonable limit, and to minimize the possibility of bad debts. A careful analysis of stock holdings should be carried out to ascertain whether the level might be reduced without materially affecting production and selling programmes.

Borrowing

The methods by which a company may obtain additional finance require very close analysis.

The merits of long- or short-term borrowing, issuing of debentures, increase in equity funds, and the like, are complex, and the accountant is responsible for ensuring that his colleagues are aware of their respective advantages and disadvantages. The likely effect of any change in gearing policy (i.e., the relationship between fixed interest and equity funds) should be carefully assessed and considered in the light of long range plans.

Such factors as interest rates and the affect of likely repayment requirements on the projected cash flow must also be considered. No one should underestimate the value of a wise decision in obtaining long-term finance on the future profitability of a company.

Expansion

At a time when take-overs are the accepted practice, and when the need for diversification becomes often painfully obvious, there is a further important opportunity for the accountant to prove his usefulness.

When expansion of a company's operations becomes desirable, it is crucial to obtain an informed evaluation of likely prospects. The ability to analyse a company's set of accounts skilfully is essential when the take-over of an existing firm is intended. The accountant must be able to apply every possible technique to 'read between the lines' and make an accurate assessment of a company's structure.

An obvious way to increase profits is to reduce overheads. One area which often escapes the scrutiny of the efficiency analyst is the one which normally falls directly under the responsibility of the accountant -- the clerical function.

Is your office running efficiently? Do you believe that office productivity can be measured? These are questions which must be faced by the profit-conscious accountant.

There are many who now believe that it is possible to assess systematically the efficiency of an office and ensure, as a production manager must, that resources are not being misused by wastage of time, outdated systems, or excessive manpower.

Conclusion

This article mentions only a few of the many situations to which the accountant's contribution can be a vital one.

One of the often justifiable criticisms of the profession is that its members spend too much time on tasks which, when analysed, are of little value and could probably be either simplified or eliminated altogether. It goes almost without saying that an accountant must be able to examine his work programme carefully, to ensure that those functions which contribute most to an organization are given priority over those which are less valuable.

By careful application of this principle, it should be possible for him to improve his image, and show that his existence within the organization is not without value.

What does the Merchant Banker expect from the Accountant? – II

by CHARLES I. BALL, F.C.A.

Prospectuses

THE requirement for accountants' reports in prospectuses is derived primarily from company legislation and the details are set out in the fourth schedule to the Companies Act 1948. Stock exchange requirements, however, frequently go beyond the provisions of the Companies Act in many aspects and, for practical purposes, it is the stock exchange requirements which are relevant.

23. The work already done by the investigating accountant, who in a prospectus is usually described as 'reporting accountant' forms the basis of the report in the prospectus. This report must contain information on the following:

- (a) The profits or losses in respect of each of the last ten completed financial years or, if the company has been incorporated for less than ten years, for the period since incorporation. If the report is in respect of a period which ended more than three months before the publication of the prospectus and no accounts for a subsequent period have been made up, a statement must be made of that fact.

- (b) The charge for depreciation for each of the years reported on.
- (c) The assets and liabilities of the company at the last balance sheet date.
- (d) The aggregate emoluments of the directors during the last completed year and the comparison with the amount payable under the arrangements in force at the date of the prospectus. Where there have been changes in the directors the exact comparison to be given must depend on the circumstances, but it should normally deal with the emoluments (defined in section 196 of the Companies Act 1948) of any person who is a director at the time of the prospectus.

The second part of a paper presented at the recent Oxford Summer Course of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales.

(e) The rate of dividend for each class of share during each of the five previous financial years, together with details of any waiver of dividends in those years.

(f) Any other matters which appear to the reporting accountant to be relevant.

24. The reporting accountant will, in most cases, be a firm other than the auditors of the company and it is normal for the report in the prospectus to be signed both by the reporting accountant and the auditor.

25. Where the company reported on is a holding company the profits will usually be set out in a consolidated form, although if different activities are carried out by the company it is preferable that the profits of each separate activity should be given. The assets and liabilities to be shown will be those of the company and also of the group as a whole.

26. Reference has so far been made to completed years of account. Where, however, the figures reported on are to a date more than nine months earlier than the prospectus, the stock exchange will not normally grant a quotation and, in practice, this means that audited accounts for six months must be made available. The company will, under stock exchange regulations, have to announce in future unaudited figures for the half-year and it is therefore an advantage in its first year as a public company to have the audited figures for the corresponding half-year already available for purposes of comparison. In addition, where a prospectus appears in, say, the tenth or eleventh month of the financial year, the company can forecast the results for the year as a whole with rather more confidence than would be the case of a forecast made much earlier in the year.

27. The audited accounts prepared each year may, in themselves, be entirely correct, but when a table of profits for ten years is shown, the result may be misleading. The prospective investor is concerned with the future and he will use the report showing the trend of past profits as a guide to assist him in confirming his own assessment of future results. It may, therefore, be necessary to make adjustments to past profits and provision for this is made in the Companies Act 1948 which states that the accountants' report shall indicate if any adjustments have been made to the figures of any profits or losses or assets and liabilities and a written statement shall be filed with the prospectus setting out the adjustments and giving the reasons.

28. The stock exchange requests that the statement of adjustments should be set out in a standard form and for the purposes of profits and losses the statement is divided into sections A and B. Section A begins with the net increase or decrease in the balance on profit and loss account shown by a comparison of the balance sheets at the beginning and end of each of the financial periods under review. There should then be added to or deducted from this amount, dividends and other appropriations and the items which are required by the Companies Act to be stated separately in the profit and loss account, such as depreciation, interest charges, audit fees, etc. The resulting total would then be the figure which is often described in accounts as 'trading profit'. Section B commences with the final figure shown in section A and additions or deductions are made in respect of items which should properly be taken into account before arriving at the profit or loss for each year. In many cases these figures will be a reversal of the items in section A, but this procedure enables different figures to be used if warranted by circumstances and also other adjustments to be made. The reasons for any of the adjustments should be indicated. The final total of section B will be the figures appearing in the accountants' report. If the company is a holding company, the statement of adjustments may deal with consolidated figures or with figures of the separate companies in the group. In the latter case a summary combining the totals of the individual companies should be prepared.

29. As regards assets and liabilities, if the total amount of the net assets in the accountants' report differs from the total amount of net assets in the last audited balance sheet, the adjustments should either be set out in the accountants' report or a separate statement made showing the adjustments.

Adjustment for exceptional items

30. Exceptional items frequently appear in companies' accounts and consideration must therefore be given as to whether these items should be added back. In view of the purpose of the ten-year record in giving a guide to the future, it may be wrong to take too much advantage of the knowledge which is provided by hindsight as the profits shown in future years will not have that advantage and there tend to be exceptional items every year. Examples of adjustments which may be expected are as follows:

- (a) If there has been a material change in the bases on which stock and work in progress has been valued during the period it may be necessary to revalue the stock on the basis which is to be used in future. This change in basis may have arisen through an alteration in the allocation of overhead expenses as a result of pressure from the Inland Revenue. Another possibility is that excessive reserves against stock may have been created to reduce the impact of taxation on the company while it was still a private company and the taxation implications on a change of basis may require consideration.
- (b) If the company is a contractor engaged on large contracts which cover a period of several years, the adjustment of claims relating to earlier periods may require special treatment. Although the reporting accountant will have the benefit of hindsight, the figures may be such that those originally shown in the profit and loss account of each year would be misleading.
- (c) Where businesses have been acquired or sold during the ten-year period, consideration will have to be given to the inclusion or exclusion of the results relating to those businesses. As a general rule if a purchase is made for cash, the results of the acquired company are included only in respect of the period since acquisition as the cash will be deemed to have made its own contribution to profits in earlier years. If a purchase is made for shares, however, the results of the acquired company for the whole ten-year period would normally be included in a separate column if the contribution to the whole is material.

The circumstances of each case require individual consideration as the solution is not always clear-cut.

31. The merchant bank, if asked, will always be prepared to proffer advice on what adjustments should be made, but the responsibility lies with the reporting accountant. Where there are major adjustments the whole trend of profits may be altered and this can have an effect on the price at which the shares of the company are marketed. A draft of the statement of adjustments must be submitted to the stock exchange at least ten days prior to publication and the statement in final form must be accompanied by a letter confirming that all adjustments which are appropriate for the purposes of the report have been made and that no other adjustments have been made.

32. Letters are also required by the stock exchange on certain accounting matters as follows:

- (a) The reporting accountants must confirm that, except as indicated in their report, they have obtained sufficient information about the stock to enable them to form the opinion that throughout the period under review stocks and work in progress were properly ascertained and in arriving at the reported profits and losses, were brought into account on bases in accordance with generally accepted accounting procedures which were applied consistently. In other words, in arriving at the adjusted profits shown in the report, the stocks must have been valued consistently, although this need not necessarily have been the case in the annual accounts.
- (b) The reporting accountants must confirm that in arriving at the reported profits and losses the provisions for depreciation are, in their opinion, reasonable having regard to the assets in respect of which it has been or will be the company's practice to make any provision for depreciation. For example, if no depreciation has been provided for freehold property that factor should be stated. Also if there has been a revaluation of fixed assets the depreciation provided should take account of the additional charge required as a result of the revaluation.
- (c) The reporting accountants must confirm that the net book value of the fixed assets in respect of which depreciation will require to be provided out of future profits does not exceed by a material amount the corresponding amounts on which capital allowances will be obtained for taxation purposes or, if there is a material difference, how this has been taken into account. This may be covered by a tax equalization account which is deducted when arriving at net assets.
- (d) For certain types of company, such as contracting companies or hire-purchase finance companies where the basis of taking profit in any one year is not always uniform in the particular industry, the stock exchange would require the report to define the methods used and would also require a letter confirming that they are in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles, which have been consistently applied.

33. The Companies Act 1948 provides that any statement made in a prospectus by an expert, which includes an accountant, must not be issued unless the expert has given and not withdrawn his consent to the issue of the prospectus with the statement included in the form and context in which it is included. The purpose of this is to ensure that no statement is made elsewhere in the prospectus which will contradict or nullify any part of the accountants' report. For instance, the directors in the 'profits and prospects' paragraph might wish to put a better gloss than the reporting accountant thought justified on a reason for a fluctuation in profit in the ten-year period. The merchant bank will, for its own protection, instruct the reporting accountant to examine and report on the profit forecast and the investor will assume that both advisers have satisfied themselves in regard to the forecast. It is doubtful if the reporting accountant would be legally liable if the forecast profit was not achieved but the letter of consent gives him the power to insist that no statement of fact or opinion is made in the rest of the prospectus without his concurrence.

Subsequent issues

34. After a company is quoted on the stock exchange the auditors will carry out their normal audit procedure year by year and there need not necessarily be any contact between them and the merchant bank. This varies from company to company, depending on whether the merchant bank keeps close touch with the progress of the company.

35. When there are new issues, however, whether they be rights issues to shareholders or placings of fixed interest stock, profit figures based on published audited accounts will usually be shown. The preparation of the documents will normally be supervised by the merchant bank who will require that the directors of the company should confirm to the merchant bank the correctness of the figures. In practice, the directors at their board meeting approving the issue will already have before them a letter from the auditors confirming that the figures are correct. There is rarely any problem in this, apart from verifying that the context in which the figures are used does not make them misleading. For example, if a new issue was to replace bank borrowing of a fluctuating amount, the company might wish to adjust the disclosed profits by the amount of the estimated saving in interest. In many cases it might be inappropriate to do so although, if the issue was to replace an existing fixed loan, there would be more justification.

36. In the type of document referred to above it would be unusual for the auditors' name to be mentioned and therefore no letter of consent is required. The assistance of the auditors is primarily to give protection to the directors and to ensure that the figures quoted are valid for the purpose for which they are used.

37. Another case in which auditors are requested to give certificates which are outside their statutory duties is in regard to borrowing powers. A debenture trust deed may state that no further issues of debentures may be made or pari passu bank borrowing created unless the auditors have certified that various formulae of asset and interest cover have been complied with. These formulae have usually been drafted from a legal point of view and the auditors regrettably may not always have been consulted at an early enough stage to ensure that the calculations can, in fact, be made. The inclusions and exclusions to be taken into account in the formulae are now so complicated that the auditors' certificate may correctly give a different answer from that intended by the draftsman. This emphasizes the need for close collaboration between the merchant bank, the company's lawyers and its auditors.

Acquisitions and amalgamations

38. The stock exchange divides the acquisition of subsidiary companies into four classes. The most important of these is known as a class 1 transaction where the size of the company being acquired is 15 per cent or more of the acquiring company. The figure of 15 per cent must be compared as to the value of the assets acquired, the net profit before tax, the value of the consideration given or the equity capital issued and if the comparison of any of these shows a figure of 15 per cent or more a circular must be sent to shareholders.

39. If the company being acquired is already a quoted company, it is normally sufficient that the circular to shareholders contains details of assets and liabilities at the last balance sheet date and of profits before tax for the previous five years, all taken from published accounts. If, however, the company being acquired is not quoted a report by an accountant must be included in the circular. This report is similar to that contained in a prospectus and relates to the profits or losses for the previous ten years and a statement of assets and liabilities. Such adjustments should also be made as are appropriate in the opinion of the accountant and a statement of adjustments must be filed with the stock exchange.

40. The same formalities apply in the case of the acquisition of an unquoted subsidiary of a public company. If the acquisition is a class 1 transaction in regard to the purchaser, an accountants' report must be sent to shareholders. If the sale is a class 1 transaction to the disposing company, it must send a circular to its shareholders and the stock exchange must be consulted in regard to the contents of the circular. If an accountants' report is required it is advisable that the same figures should be used for the acquisition and disposal, although circumstances can be envisaged when, through an inconsistent treatment on adjustments, the figures told a different story.

41. A problem that frequently arises on the report on an unquoted company is in relation to stock valuations. These can be checked only by reference to stock sheets which may not be available for ten years. Where a quotation is to be obtained for the unquoted company itself, the stock exchange can refuse to grant a quotation if the accountants' report is qualified and it will probably refuse to do so unless a clean report can be given at least for the last two or three years. In the case of an acquisition, however, and particularly if it is for cash, the powers of the stock exchange are rather more limited although they have to approve the contents of the letter to shareholders. Their policy is generally that if the shareholders, acting through the directors, and with full knowledge of the deficiencies, wish to make an acquisition it is not for the stock exchange to prevent it. Where the absence of accounting information is very glaring, whether it is on stock or other matters, the stock exchange may request that full disclosure of any deficiencies or qualifications be made in a circular and that the shareholders in general meeting should approve the acquisition. Accountants must consider whether they can properly sign a report which contains a serious deficiency in stock verification. The presence of a qualification in relation to stock may mean that the accounting standards in general are low.

42. It depends on circumstances as to whether the accountant reporting on the company being acquired is the auditor of the latter or of the purchaser. Where it is decided to use the auditor of the purchaser or even possibly an independent accountant, consideration must be given by the merchant bank acting for the purchaser whether the accountant should prepare his report before the negotiations have been concluded. In some cases negotiations may take place on a provisional basis based on information supplied by the company being acquired. The terms must, therefore, be flexible until the report is completed as fresh evidence might be produced, but bad feeling can sometimes be created in these circumstances as the motive for reopening negotiations may be misconstrued. The situation can be compared to the purchase of a house subject to survey, where, following the survey, the price may be re-negotiated and the urgency in which the vendor wishes to sell may be more important than the faults found by the survey. Likewise the report may be used to justify a lower price for the company although the true reason is tactical or possibly a change in market conditions.

43. An alternative method of procedure is for the report to be produced before negotiations get to a serious stage. This may mean that there will have been a waste of time and expense if the parties are unable to reach agreement on terms, but it has the big advantage that if agreement is reached the contract can be completed immediately, thus eliminating the risk of altered market conditions or a change of mind.

44. The report on the company being acquired may be limited to the ten-year record of profits and statement of assets and liabilities necessary for the circular to shareholders. Unless the purchaser has considerable knowledge already of the other company, it is desirable if time permits that a detailed accountants' report giving full information as in paragraph 14 above be prepared. The purchaser will then be better informed on his purchase, thereby facilitating the management decisions that may be necessary following the purchase. Also subsequent misunderstandings and recriminations may be avoided as any deficiencies or weaknesses should have been pointed out in the report. If a report by an independent accountant has been made for the vendor, this can be available for another occasion, whether for another purchaser or even for quotation, if the intending purchaser does not proceed. A report made on behalf of the intending purchaser would almost certainly not be available for any other purpose.

45. In some cases the unquoted company being acquired may be larger than the acquiring quoted company and such a transaction is then referred to as a reverse takeover. The stock exchange will require that the transaction be subject to the approval of the shareholders of the acquiring company and that in the meantime the quotation be suspended. The suspension will last until approval has been obtained and all relevant information made available. This information will include an accountants' report on the unquoted company being acquired, and in certain circumstances of the purchasing company, and also a pro forma balance sheet of the reorganized group. This will all be contained in an advertised statement which is similar to that for a prospectus of a newly quoted company. In exceptional cases the stock exchange may not grant quotation until the acquisition has taken place and a full year's accounts have been published showing the effect of the merger.

46. Even when both companies which are proposing to merge are already public companies and published information is available, consideration must be given by the respective merchant banks whether accountants should be asked to prepare a report to ensure that the profits have been arrived at on a comparable basis. Although the accounts of both companies may have been individually correct, it might be wrong to use the results to determine the basis of merger. Examples of matters which would need to be considered in comparing both sets of figures are as follows:

- (a) The method of stock valuation. It is advisable that this should be put on a similar basis for both companies as there may be a change of basis after the merger which means that the combined profits will not necessarily be the same as the profits of the two companies taken separately.
- (b) Depreciation policy. Some companies may write off their assets over short periods or may calculate depreciation on replacement cost and their disclosed profits will usually be lower in comparison with others which adopt a more normal policy or do their calculations on historical cost.
- (c) Rental income. There are several different ways of capitalizing the cost of installations rented to customers and in writing off the resulting depreciation out of rental income. The difference in accountancy treatment can lead to large variations in the financial outcome and adjustments should be made to arrive at a uniform basis.
- (d) Interest on property developments. Companies vary in their treatment of the interest charges on properties in the course of development, i.e., whether they should be added to capital cost or charged against income and a consistent treatment should be adopted.
- (e) Pension schemes. Where a company is to join another group it is likely that its pension scheme will be brought into line with the rest of the group providing, of course, that this is in the interests of the employees. It is common, however, for the schemes of smaller companies to be less generous than those of the larger ones and an additional annual cost will therefore be incurred to bring the scheme into line. A substantial provision may also be required for back service and in assessing the terms of the merger it may be necessary to adjust the published profits and possibly the net assets.
- (f) Investment grants and tax equalization. The treatment of the investment grants received in respect of capital expenditure differs from company to company and this should be brought on to a uniform basis. The adjustments will be reflected in the balance sheet in addition to the profit and loss account. The same comments apply to tax equalization where, owing to substantial capital allowances, the tax paid in relation to profits may be subnormal.

47. The comparisons made above may be done by accountants acting for each party in consultation with each other or an independent accountant may be asked to collate the information on both companies. Many other factors will enter into the negotiations to be carried out by the merchant bank but the starting point for these negotiations must be the profits of the companies prepared on a comparable basis.

48. If the merger is a friendly one there will be reasonable facilities for examination of the figures of the other side although there may still be reluctance to reveal all the secrets in case the intended merger does not proceed. In addition, the City Code on takeovers and mergers states that any information given to a preferred suitor has to be furnished on request to a less welcome but bona fide offerer. The panel which was set up to supervise the operation of the code can, however, be consulted if this would lead to the disclosure of confidential commercial information to a competitor. Where the first bid has been made without the co-operation of the defending board, there will, of course, be no opportunity for examination of figures and the bidder may receive a shock if the accounting bases are different from those he had expected. Although this is a case of caveat emptor, it does no good to the reputation of the City or the accountancy profession if the bidder successfully casts doubt on the validity of the published accounts.

49. When an announcement of an acquisition is made, even if the size is below that which requires a circular to shareholders, the stock exchange request that the value of the acquisition should be stated. Unless the value is given it is impossible for the investor to know whether the acquisition is material. Apart from the tendency of many companies not to disclose anything unless they are obliged to, a reason for not doing so is on account of the share premium account which may have to be created. A cash purchase obviously presents no difficulties, but if the acquisition is partly or wholly in shares, the fixing of a value at such an early stage may prejudice negotiations with the Inland Revenue on stamp duty and may also take away flexibility in dealing with the problem of creating goodwill and share premium when the purchase is reflected in the balance sheet. Some companies treat the issue of shares as being at nominal value, others at market value, and a third possibility is the equivalent of the net asset value of the acquired company. It is therefore advisable that the auditors be consulted so that the wording of the announcement is consistent with the accountancy treatment to be adopted.

50. Tax legislation in regard to acquisitions and amalgamations has become increasingly complicated in recent years and it is therefore necessary that the company's tax advisers, who may or may not be the auditors, should be consulted before irrevocable steps are taken. The merchant bank acting for the company will usually insist that such advice is sought. Capital gains tax and the treatment of losses are among the subjects that cause the greatest difficulty. In addition the tax and accountancy implications of using a new holding company rather than an offer being made by one of the existing companies will have to be carefully considered.

CIR v. Wachtel

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division) –
July 21st, 1970
(Before Mr Justice GOFF)

Surtax – Settlement – Bank overdraft to trustees – Guarantee by settlor – Deposit account by him – Purchase of shares – Dividends applied to reduce overdraft – Like sums withdrawn from deposit account – Controlled company substituted for settlor – Whether settlor had interest in settlement – Whether non-income sums paid to settlor – Income Tax Act 1952, sections 405, 408, 411 (2).

On April 4th, 1960, the taxpayer settled £1,000 for the benefit of his children. On the following day the trustees contracted to purchase all the issued capital in Ebor Investments Ltd for £7,690 14s 2d. An arrangement was made with the District Bank Ltd for a sum to be advanced on overdraft to the trustees, sufficient to enable them to buy the shares. The taxpayer guaranteed the overdraft, and opened a deposit account at the bank sufficient to cover the overdraft. The bank was to apply towards satisfying the guarantee any sum standing at any time to the taxpayer's credit at the bank. The rate of interest chargeable on the overdraft was limited to 1 per cent, and no interest was payable on the deposit account, but the income of the trust was to be applied to reduce its indebtedness to the bank, and the deposit was to be reduced accordingly.

The trustees' current account was opened on April 5th, 1960, with a debit of £7,500, which was used to buy the Ebor shares, and on the same day the £1,000 was paid in, thus leaving an overdraft of £6,500. On April 22nd, 1960, a further £190 14s 2d was placed to the taxpayer's deposit account, and two days later a like sum was drawn by the trustees on overdraft to complete the purchase of the Ebor shares. Thereafter the dividends were paid in reduction of the overdraft, and similar amounts were withdrawn from the deposit account. When interest was debited to the overdraft, the taxpayer added the amount to the deposit account.

On March 28th, 1961, a company, Saul Wachtel Ltd, was incorporated, and took over the taxpayer's business, but the company had no connection with the settlement. The taxpayer and his wife owned all the shares and were the directors, and he was a creditor on loan account. In June 1962 the company assumed the taxpayer's position as to the guarantee and the deposit account, and the taxpayer withdrew his own deposit.

Assessments to surtax were made on the taxpayer for 1960–61 to 1963–64 on the footing that the settlement deed and the arrangements between the taxpayer and the bank and between Saul Wachtel Ltd and the bank constituted a settlement, within section 411 (2) of the Income Tax Act 1952, in which the taxpayer, as the settlor, had an interest for the purpose of section 405 of the Act; and that the sums paid into the taxpayer's deposit account and subsequently into the company's deposit account were funds provided directly or indirectly by the taxpayer, the settlor, for the purposes of the settlement. In the High Court, however, the Revenue did not contend that the deposit accounts were such funds; but they contended that the substitution of Saul Wachtel Ltd made no difference to the claim under section 405; and they conceded that if they had to rely on section 408, they could not support assessments for any period after June 1962. It was also contended for the Revenue that section 408 applied, in that the trustees had paid capital sums directly or indirectly to the taxpayer as settlor.

The Special Commissioners decided that the taxpayer did not have any interest in any of the settlement's income or property, and that therefore section 405 did not apply, because there was no specific power in the settlement deed to repay borrowed money; and that section 408 was not applicable because there had been no payment to the settlor directly or indirectly.

Held: (i) there was a settlement as decided by the Special Commissioners; (ii) the settled fund was the £1,000, the Ebor shares and the dividends thereon, but not the deposit account because no interests in favour of beneficiaries were created thereout; (iii) the taxpayer was the settlor; (iv) he had an interest in the settlement, as the payments by the trustees to the bank were indirectly for his benefit; (v) the taxpayer's position was not altered when Saul Wachtel Ltd replaced him; (vi) as the bank was not in law accountable to the taxpayer, the loans on overdraft to the trustees were not repaid to him, and therefore section 408 was not applicable.

Eastham v. Leigh, London and Provincial Properties Ltd

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division) –
July 29th, 1970
(Before Mr Justice GOFF)

Capital gains tax – Short-term tax – Land – Building agreement – Licence to erect building – Then lease to be granted – Whether conditional contract – Whether three-year period exceeded – Finance Act 1962, sections 10, 16 (8), Schedule 9, paragraph 1 – Finance Act 1965, section 17 (5).

On June 22nd, 1962, the company made an agreement with the landlords of a building site for the demolition of the existing building and the erection of a new one within two years. The company was given leave and licence to enter the site for that purpose, and it was to:

'hold the said premises until the same shall be comprised in a lease to be granted as hereinafter provided as tenants at will to the landlords'.

The building was to be erected to the satisfaction of the landlords' surveyor. Until then the company was to pay such rent and perform such covenants and conditions as if the lease had actually been granted; and the landlords had various rights, including re-entry on default by the company, and they could extend the time for the completion of the work. By clause 4 if the building should have been finished to the surveyor's satisfaction at the end of the two years (or any extended period), and the company should have observed all the stipulations and conditions on their part contained, the landlords were to grant a lease for 125 years from June 24th, 1962.

The company duly performed its obligations within the prescribed period, and the lease was granted on May 12th, 1964. The date of the surveyor's certificate did not appear, but it could not have been sufficiently long before the grant of the lease to make any material difference. On July 28th, 1965, the lease was assigned for a sum greatly in excess of the expenditure incurred by the company.

It was contended for the Revenue that the contract was made a conditional one by clause 4; and that the three-year interval in section 10 (2) of the Finance Act 1962 had to be reckoned from the date of the grant of the lease. It was contended for the company that the contract was not conditional, because it did not depend on a condition outside the contract before it became absolute. The Special Commissioners decided in favour of the company.

Held: the Special Commissioners' decision was correct.

New Light on Merger Motives

by RONALD W. MOON, B.Litt, F.C.A.

Publication of a second edition of Nicholas Stacey's book Mergers in Modern Business coincided with the appearance of a new work Management and Merger Activity by Gerald D. Newbould. In this article Ronald Moon compares their contrasting outlook and approach which often give rise to some conflict of opinion.

IN the final chapter of the completely revised second edition of his book¹ Mr Nicholas Stacey makes an eloquent plea for more research into the real motives for mergers. As he puts it: 'Little serious literature has so far been published in Great Britain about mergers and acquisitions in general, and about their implications for the nation, or for business in general.' In the event this call for action was answered with the simultaneous publication of a new study² by Gerald Newbould which explores some of the benefits and hazards of the merger boom of 1967 and 1968.

Mr Newbould's investigations lead him to conclude that mergers are primarily management-orientated. Market dominance, the collective desire to acquire quick and certain shares of the market and to eliminate competition, was clearly the main reasoning behind the sample survey (38 companies) responding to his request for an interview followed up by a questionnaire.

But, as the author himself is at pains to point out, during those very two years 2,501 mergers occurred in which firms valued at over £5,200 million were taken over. Maybe Mr Newbould is a trifle hasty in arriving at such forthright conclusions from so small a sample.

Again, in comparing the Board of Trade statistics for 1967 and 1968 with his own analysis of take-overs, mergers and deals by quoted, unquoted and unincorporated businesses taken from the daily financial press, Mr Newbould finds that the former data understated merger activity by 54 per cent by value, or 58 per cent by numbers.

He complains that: 'This emergence of merger activity has passed largely unnoticed but on traditional grounds it appears to be important.' Yet the limited coverage of the Board of Trade statistics is clearly recognized in Mr Stacey's book and was also dealt with in an article by the present writer in The Accountant of January 4th, 1969. The simple answer is that the disparity in numbers and value particularly in 1968 can be explained by the exclusion from official statistics of some very large banking, insurance, and property mergers along with many smaller acquisitions by unquoted companies.

Moving on to discuss the question of financial analysis, Mr Newbould examines 223 mergers in respect of share price behaviour. Here his findings are that the final bid prices in 161 uncontested mergers were on average about one-third higher than the prices ruling four weeks before the first bid whereas the mean increases for the 62 contested bids were much higher – over three-quarters in the case of those defended by the directors and just under three-quarters where third parties entered the contest.

There is therefore little or no difference between the mean increase in the share prices of victim firms in mergers contested by third parties and in mergers resisted by the directors alone. The author then continues: 'The issue must be raised whether the directors who did not contest a bid are guilty of trading personal security (through non-opposition, to the bidding firm) for inferior terms for their own shareholders, or of some neglect of duty through insufficient activity.'

On closer examination, this argument cannot be upheld. The directors of most companies receiving an offer usually consult their merchant bankers or other financial advisers before deciding whether or not to recommend the bid to their shareholders. There is no question of them caving in to the first offer that comes along, and if this was so, the directors of over 95 per cent of the victim firms would be culpable according to author's own statistics. In any case General Principle 9 of the City Code enjoins directors of an offeree company to act only in their capacity as directors and not have regard to their personal or family shareholdings or their personal relationship with the companies in advising their shareholders.

Methods of valuation

Turning to methods of valuation, Mr Newbould seems to be on surer ground. The single most common method was asset value (used mainly by the smaller bidding firms), followed closely by the current share price of the victim firm (mostly employed by the larger firms). The P/E ratio was adopted as the basis of valuation in some other cases, though not in any absolute sense, but rather to avoid buying the victim firm's shares on a higher P/E ratio than that of the bidding firm's shares. Oddly enough, in reply to the question: 'Was the initial value calculated within your company, or by your adviser?' 23 out of 38 companies indicated that the valuation was an inside job – the rest either depending upon merchant bankers or other advisers, or acting jointly with their advisers.

As the author remarks: 'The absence of any real attempt at valuing the proposed victim firm may go some way towards explaining the very high rates of growth of net earnings that will have to be effected by some managements.' Evidently, discounted cash flow or some variant of that technique is a non-starter in the merger stakes. But all this hardly squares with Mr Stacey's views on valuation. He argues that: 'The up-to-date methods of valuing a company for corporate transaction must first consider profits. This does not disregard the asset position; but this has lately become of secondary importance.' Nowadays it seems that the balance sheet plays second fiddle to the profit and loss account.

Reverting to Mr Newbould again, his next chapter takes a close look at the managerial reasons for merging. Market dominance (here embracing defensive reasons as well as reinforcement of the market position) accounts for nearly two-thirds of the aggregate reasoning. Since over 80 per cent of all mergers for which a consideration of £1 million or over was paid were horizontal, it rather follows that attempts to preserve or enlarge the market share would fall into this category.

But to conclude that 'management appears to be the only consistent gainer from merger activity' ignores the claims of those who can collectively make or break a bid – the shareholders of the bidder company. In fact, the Stock Exchange requires the offer document to state any financial advantage expected to accrue to an acceptor, while under the City Code profit forecasts give some indication of current and future prospects.

Mr Stacey, on the other hand, while not disregarding the economics of scale and access to additional finance puts his emphasis upon two quite different reasons, viz., management talent and research and development of new products. In the final analysis, of course, the basic purpose of sound mergers is just what it has always been – making the best use of scarce economic resources.

Mr Newbould's last point dealing with the post-merger phase might well be sub-titled 'waiting for synergy'. As it happens, the sample of 38 firms is exactly split between those which did pursue synergy (the $2+2=5$ proposition) with some vigour, and those which did not. One can only add that in view of the short period of time that elapsed between the merger and the date of the interview (the minimum interval was eight months, the maximum 30 months, and the average 17 months) his expectations were pitched much too high. Evidently, the benefits to be reaped from a merger are mostly long-term. In truth, 'there was nothing to suggest that synergy was an automatic concomitant of merger' to use the author's own words.

Efficiency audits?

Mr Newbould's final chapter looks at the implications for public merger policy. Several courses of action are examined but his remedy is to create an 'Efficiency Commission', which, apparently would not just concern itself with potential mergers but 'would be a perpetual threat to all firms'. But how does one define and measure efficiency? And what manner of persons would undertake this unenviable task? Fortunately, we are given one or two clues to his thinking on this score. The Efficiency Commission 'may operate with a very small staff' for 'it can contract out the efficiency audit . . .'. In view of the diverse nature of manufacturing industry, let alone distribution and the service industries, one seriously questions whether there are enough 'efficiency auditors' to go round.

Mr Stacey, on the other hand, believes that the existing legislation is adequate. Despite the latent obstacles in the Monopolies and Mergers Act 1965, he thinks mergers have been encouraged by a variety of 'official' persuasions. Nevertheless, he stresses the delicate nature of merger discussions and how much depends on psychological as well as on economic and business conditions prevailing at the time. He is in no doubt but that 'the slightest obstacle can unhinge many well-planned mergers'.

Let the last word on the subject remain with Mr Stacey. Looking towards the 1970s, he warns us that one in every six or so substantial companies in Britain will either acquire or be acquired over the next ten years. And if that projection isn't daunting enough, then the multinational corporation may become a force to reckon with, especially if Britain manages to join the Common Market in due course.

Preparation for 1972 International Congress

AS previously announced, Australia will be the host country for the Tenth International Congress of Accountants in 1972, and a strong organizing committee of the Australian profession has been appointed under the chairmanship of Mr C. W. Andersen, DIP.COM., F.A.S.A., F.C.I.S., Executive Director of the Australian Society of Accountants, with the aim of maintaining the high standards set on previous occasions. The President of the Congress will be Sir Ronald Irish, O.B.E., F.C.A.(AUST.), and the Vice-President, Mr G. W. Bottrill, F.A.S.A.

The theme of the Congress will be 'Financial Measurement and Communication'. Amongst the papers to be presented are 'Principles and problems in consolidation' by Mr D. D. Rae Smith, M.C., B.A., F.C.A., of the London firm of Deloitte, Plender, Griffiths & Co, and 'Information for proprietors and others' by Mr Robert M. Trueblood, C.P.A., a Past-President of the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants. Congress sessions will be held in the Sydney Opera House, the official language being English, with simultaneous translation into French, Spanish and Japanese.

As the capital city of New South Wales, Sydney is well established as a tourist centre, its harbour and beaches, and the scenery of the nearby Blue Mountains being internationally famous. In addition to the business sessions, delegates will have every opportunity to participate in a programme of entertainment which includes visits to private homes, restaurants, night clubs and the theatre, a symphony concert, harbour and river trips, and a variety of sporting facilities.

Intending participants who wish to be placed on the mailing list for further information are invited to write to the Secretary, Tenth International Congress of Accountants, London Assurance House, 16 Bridge Street, Sydney NSW 2000, Australia.

The Role of the Professional Man

AN GLOOMY view of the status of the professional man in Australia was given by the South Australian Attorney-General, Mr King, in the course of an address to a recent Adelaide Seminar of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Australia and the Australian Society of Accountants.

According to Mr King, the professional man is far from being held in the reverence and awe which characterized past attitudes of ordinary citizens. Changing social conditions had reduced the personal value of relationships and the client now saw his relationship with his professional adviser as purely a business meeting. He was, therefore, less tolerant of his professional adviser's errors and was prone to seek legal redress if he suffered loss as a result of them. Any inhibitions were removed because he knew the damages would not be paid by the adviser, but by his insurance company.

Mr King's remarks are likely to stimulate a major difference of opinion within both the accountancy and legal professions. A case could be made, for example, that the status of a chartered accountant, as evidenced by his income relative to other professions, is as great as it has ever been. However, there is no doubt that there is much underlying truth in Mr King's remarks which represent an honest reflection of contemporary attitudes towards the profession.

UNITED STATES

The Ones that Got Away

AN analysis released by the Department of Commerce last month suggests that the American system of self-assessment for income tax may not be nearly so successful as some of its transatlantic admirers have assumed. Delving back into history, the Department has discovered that, in 1968, almost $45,000 million (£18,700 million) of personal income apparently went unreported. Ten years earlier the unreported sum was under $30,000 million; ten years before that it was less than half the 1968 total. Even applying an average tax rate of only 10 per cent, the tax lost in this way would amount to $4,500 million (£1,870 million) annually – and must have risen still further in the last two years.

Since no one would be foolhardy enough to disclose how much income he is concealing from the authorities, this whole question is full of uncertainties. Pointing to the imperfections in the data, the Department warns that 'the estimate of non-reported income should not be used as the indicator of non-compliance'. It stresses that the estimate is arrived at by measuring the difference between totals that are themselves subject to error. Moreover, some of the unreported income must belong to people below the reporting minimum, and some of it is no doubt brought to light by investigations in later years.

Yet the size of the unreported figure is large enough, even by American standards, to suggest that the self-assessment system is decidedly leaky. It is some consolation that, as a percentage of adjusted personal income, unreported income has been dwindling in importance. The tax collectors have been catching up with more of the taxpayers who formerly got away; and no doubt the gradual moves toward more stringent reporting procedures – by payers of dividends and interest, for instance – are having the desired effect. Even so, in 1968, 7½ per cent of adjusted gross income still went unreported.

Because of the reservations made by the Department of Commerce, it seems fair to assume that the tax loss on this hidden income is less than 7½ per cent of the total tax due. With individual income tax much the largest source of federal revenues, however, it may be guessed that the equivalent of more than £1,000 million annually is being lost through non-reporting. This throws an unflattering light on the self-assessment system, and on complimentary statements such as that attributed to Mr Iain Macleod earlier this year: 'It is the way, I assure you, to achieve simplification vastly . . . more efficiently than the present system.' – From our New York Correspondent.

SOUTH AFRICA

A National Society of Chartered Accountants?

THE profession in South Africa is organized in four autonomous societies of chartered accountants in Natal, the Cape, the Transvaal and the Orange Free State. Each society is equally represented on the Public Accountants' and Auditors' Board which maintains under statutory powers a national register of accountants and auditors and which administers the final qualifying examination; and also on the National Council of Chartered Accountants (SA) which is a general advisory body on matters not falling within the scope of the PAAB.

It has been suggested in various quarters that to continue with four provincial societies and a national council is wasteful of both money and time, and that there should be a single national society of South African chartered accountants. Despite this pressure, recent comment in The South African Chartered Accountant indicates that little progress has been made towards unification.

One objection to possible unification is that it would lead to domination of the profession by the Transvaal Society, which has the largest individual membership. The Transvaal President has specifically disclaimed any such intention, and conceded that the other societies should be given 'more than proportional representation' in any national body.

BELGIUM

International Study of Accounting History

ACCOUNTING historians from 20 countries will Assemble in Brussels next month for a three-day international symposium at the Albert I Royal Library of Belgium. This gathering, the first of its kind, has been sponsored by the Collège Nationale des Experts Comptables de Belgique and is expected to lead to the setting-up of an international committee on accounting history.

The Royal Library was originally established in 1467 from the collection of Philip, Duke of Burgundy, and was founded under its present title in 1559. In addition to the symposium, which meets from October 9th to 12th, an exhibition of books illustrating 'Accounting through the Ages' will be mounted at the Library from October 2nd until November 8th.

Twenty-two early works on accounting will be on loan to the exhibition from The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales. These include the only perfect copy now extant of Peele's Maner and Fourme how to Kepe a Perfekte Reconyng, published by Richard Grafton in 1553, and Mellis's A Briefe Instruction and Maner how to Keepe Bookes of Accompts, reprinted in 1588 from an earlier text which is believed to have been the first treatise on double entry book-keeping in the English language. Other volumes are being provided by the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland and the British Museum.

The symposium proceedings will be conducted in English and in French. Members of the profession who may wish to attend are invited to write to the CNECB at Rue du Congrès 49, 1000 Brussels, Belgium.

INDIA

Moves Against Tax Avoidance

DRASTIC measures to restrict tax avoidance are included in the 1970 Finance Bill recently approved by the legislature. These include the withdrawal of personal reliefs, a maximum allowance of Rs200 (about £15) monthly for use of a car, and the total disallowance of entertainment expenditure within India, including expenditure on guest-houses and long-term hotel reservations for customers or clients.

The income of discretionary trusts established other than by will is to be taxed at a minimum rate of 65 per cent on the first Rs60,000, compared with an effective rate of approximately 42 per cent on individual incomes of that amount. Trust income in excess of Rs60,000 is taxable at the rates applicable to individuals, rising to a maximum of 85 per cent on taxable income in excess of Rs200,000 per annum. (From 'Overseas Tax Developments', prepared by the Inland Revenue Board Library, Foreign Section.)

CANADA

Unification of the Profession

THE Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants is to hold discussions with the Society of Industrial Accountants and the General Accountants Association, with a view to integration. Under the proposals, described as the most significant in the Canadian profession's 90 years' history, students would be required to complete a uniform 'common knowledge' examination, together with certain other 'stream' papers appropriate to public practice, industry or government service. There is a further possibility of post-qualification specialist diplomas in such areas as auditing, taxation or management accounting.

Auditors' Security of Tenure

APPARENTLY it is still possible in Canada for an Auditor to be replaced 'with little publicity and no explanation' and the Canadian Press has reported several such cases arising from differences of opinion between auditors and management over disclosure in financial statements.

The Accounting and Auditing Research Committee of the Canadian Institute has issued several recommendations in the area of appropriate accounting practices, and it has been suggested that failure to apply these should be regarded in the light of a breach of professional ethics. The Institute's executive director is quoted as saying that acceptance of the research recommendations may be seriously undermined if individuals are allowed to ignore them without stating their reasons.

BANK HOLIDAY READING

The Cut of the Cloth

by WALTER AMES

ABOUT twice a year Garrett got a bee in his bonnet over backsliding at the office. Last time it was being late for work; this time it was dress.

'We present an image', he told Sir Godfrey, the senior partner. 'And that image must not be tarnished by the staff wearing slovenly clothes. Did you see young Miller yesterday?'

'Miller's bright,' Sir Godfrey said. 'His clothes belie him.'

'As staff partner,' rejoined Garrett, 'I insist on everyone being properly dressed at the office. I'll send him a stiff memo about it.'

When Miller read the memorandum, he flushed angrily. 'He's at it again!' he shouted to Glasp, the elderly senior. 'Dehumanization! That's it. So long as the jobs are done in the time-limits, he doesn't give a damn about people. I'm going to see him about this.'

Outside Garrett's office was a small traffic-light gadget, which he worked from a switchbox on his desk. Red was ENGAGED, amber meant WAIT, and green signified COME IN.

When Miller reached the door the red light was on, but he knew Garrett frequently kept it like that merely to make himself inaccessible and to create an appearance of hard work.

Miller flung open the door and strode in. He threw the memorandum on the staff partner's desk. 'What's all this about?' he growled.

Garrett was startled. Long ago he had realized that most people are frightened by anger, and he had always won a grudging obedience from his subordinates through a sham ferocity he had cultivated over the years.

'Who the devil told you to come in here? Get out at once!'

Miller spread his big hands firmly on the desk and leaned forward. 'Why didn't you have the guts to tell me to my face that I don't dress decently?'

'I'm not going to start arguing with you, Miller ...'

'Oh, yes you are! What's wrong with the way I dress?'

Garrett took the only way out. 'Sit down, Miller, and we'll discuss this calmly. Cigarette?'

Miller took one, and pulled up a chair.

'Well now,' Garrett began smoothly. 'You know the office rules. You tell me why you don't dress as we require.'

Miller stared at him. 'I can't afford it.'

'What?'

'I can't afford it. You've never known what it's like to be short, have you?'

'Is that your way of saying we underpay you?'

Miller took a deep breath and his face tightened. 'I'm paid a fair salary and I do a fair day's work for it. You know that as well as I do. But you'll never understand that some people haven't got a private income, will you?'

Garrett felt a vague disquiet. He wasn't at all certain of his ground. But he was still a partner and he had to act like one.

'Alright, so you admit we pay you well. Why then, young man, can't you afford to buy a good suit?'

'A good suit! Because I've a widowed mother, and a couple of sisters still at school, and I have to keep them. And I pay the rent for the house we live in, and help my brother who's studying for the Bar. That's why.'

The resentment, the anger, in Miller's voice disturbed Garrett. It was true that he himself had never wanted for anything.

Then there was the work to think of. Miller was in a bit of a frenzy, and it wouldn't take much to make him quit. Staff were short and Miller was a capable man.

Garrett began to regret the way he had phrased the memorandum. Something drastic would have to be done. He leaned back in his chair, fingertips together, looking thoughtful and judicious. Then he smiled.

'I see. I didn't know you were placed like that. Why didn't you tell me before? Even so, the firm can't have you dressing like that. But I tell you what. In the interests of the firm - and not as a favour to you - we'll buy you a new suit. How's that?'

'That's fine. I'm not proud.'

'Good, it's settled then. But don't forget the tax angle.'

'Pardon?'

Garrett smiled importantly. 'Wilkins v. Rogerson. Tax case. Involved a firm giving one of their men a suit. Revenue boys tried to tax him on the cost, but the Courts said, oh no, it's the second-hand value he should pay tax on. Because that's what he'd get if he sold it. So he paid tax on only a fiver, instead of £15. Of course, that was because, like you, he was earning less than £2,000 a year. If he was earning £2,000 or more, he'd have been taxed on the cost to the employer.'

'So what you mean,' Miller said slowly, 'is that if you give me the cash to buy a suit I'll pay tax on the full amount. But if I get it and tell the tailor to charge it to the firm, I'll be taxed only on a fraction of the cost.'

Garrett beamed again. 'Exactly. It's a bloody stupid distinction, isn't it?'

Garrett rose, and showed Miller the door. He felt pleased with himself; he'd displayed a generous spirit and kept the goodwill of the staff. Decision. Incisiveness. That's how you became a partner.

A week later Sir Godfrey rang for Garrett. The staff partner came to his office and sat down.

'I see you've dealt with young Miller,' Sir Godfrey said, lighting a cigar. 'Nice suit he's wearing. Good cut.'

Garrett flipped his hand. 'Yes, poor chap was hard up. Got a widowed mother and all that, so I arranged for the firm to pay for a new suit. Good for staff morale, too. Nice psychological touch. I thought.'

'Quite. The bill's come in. Here it is.'

'Oh! My God!'

There was a hard glint in Sir Godfrey's eyes. He looked Garrett up and down.

'Can't have the staff dressing better than the partners, you know, Garrett. How long have you had that suit?'

'This one? Only six months ...'

'It's rather shabby.'

'Oh, is it? I ...'

I would make it Savile Row,' Sir Godfrey said, standing up.

Garrett got up, and moved towards the door.

'And by the way,' Sir Godfrey said suddenly. 'I like the way young Miller handled this. See he gets a rise, will you?'

In a 'Playfair' code-square the letters of the key-word, in which no letter recurs, precede the rest of the alphabet in order; I does duty for J and J. To encode a word, split it into pairs of letters thus: P R E F E R. If letters of a pair occur in same rank in square, use letters to right of each (for last letter of rank use first letter); if in same column, use letters below each (for bottom letter of column use top letter); otherwise treat them as limits of diagonals of a rectangle and use limits of opposite diagonals (PR=IA, not AI, which=RP). Result: IA SG GB. Then join into one word IASGGB. Answers to four clues in italics are to appear in diagram in code, according to a code-square with a key-word which has to be discovered. Most of their letters in their encoded forms can be found from interlocking words. Comparison of these with their letters in their normal forms yields some code equations from which the code-square used is to be deduced.

Finance and Commerce

Gascoigne Group

THE past year and more has been a difficult and searching period for the Gascoigne Group, agricultural and dairy engineers. In March last year everything seemed to be going well enough with the exception of the Italian company which, largely because of inadequate local management, was having to cease manufacture and was being run down. Westminster Bank and Hill, Samuel & Co were stated to have given guarantees to the Credito Italiano to provide funds for bridging finance pending the realization of major Italian assets.

But elsewhere prospects pleased and Mr James Cullingham, the chairman, was confident that 'future statements to be presented to shareholders will show even better results'. The raising of additional permanent capital to finance planned expansion was being considered.

Three months later, in the following June, it was announced that a scheme of arrangement for realization of Italian assets and discharge of liabilities there had been applied for but that Italian losses would be a once-and-for-all write-off from capital reserves and would not effect profits for 1968-69 which, the chairman hoped, would be higher than in 1967-68. It had been decided by then to postpone raising further capital until the Italian position had been cleared up.

But last October, only ten days before the end of the financial year, it was announced that UK sales for nine months were some 10 per cent down in the agricultural sphere but that over the UK group as a whole there would only be a marginal sales drop. It had, by then, been decided to put the Italian company into liquidation but it was pointed out that the group had sufficient liquidity to deal with a commitment of £260,000-£280,000 under guarantee. Group profits, it was stated, would not be as good as planned but would be at least £200,000.

Last January the Adwest Group agreed to make an offer for the £5,999,000 Gascoigne ordinary shares not already owned by Adwest on the basis of 5s 6d of 8½ per cent convertible loan stock for every Gascoigne share. The Gascoigne directors recommended acceptance but in the following month it was announced that an independent report made available to the boards of the two companies stated that it was not possible to reappraise stocks at October 31st, 1968, on a comparable basis to that made on October 31st, 1969, and that 1968-69 results were 'not capable of verification'. Adwest decided not to go ahead with their bid and Gascoignes asked the London Stock Exchange to suspend dealings in Gascoigne shares.

In July, trading profits for 1968-69 were reported at £147,578 before tax and exceptional items. The Board of Trade by then had been notified that it had not been possible to convene the 1970 annual meeting before June 30th.

Re-calculated

And so to the recently issued accounts forming this week's reprint. The chairman reports that Price Waterhouse & Co were engaged to assist and advise the company on the preparation of the 1968-69 accounts and to examine the profit forecast for 1969-70. In view of the criticisms of the Reading (the main works) stock and work in progress valuation made by the accountants acting for Adwest, Price Waterhouse initially investigated this position and virtually the whole of the 1968 and 1969 valuations were re-calculated by the company under the supervision of Price Waterhouse and the external accountants.

The investigating accountants have reported to the board that subject to the adequacy of provisions held for equipment under guarantee and for the claims referred to under 16 (c) of the Notes, the accounts take proper account of all matters that have come to their attention.

One of the difficulties is the problem of funding the liability on the Italian guarantee over a reasonable period and much depends on current trading. Unfortunately, present indications are that 1969-70 trading profits will be 'substantially below 1968-69' but that no exceptional losses will need to be provided for.

So far during the current financial year there has been a substantial drop in turnover, and in the agricultural and dairy division there is likely to be a loss. Prospects for 1970-71, however, are considered encouraging. Current turnover and prospects for the industrial division are good and the Gascoigne (Kee Klamps) subsidiary will have a record year.

Management structure

The directors, Mr Cullingham says, are aware of the necessity for improving and strengthening the management structure. Price Waterhouse & Co confirm that the group needs first-class, full-time assistance at top level and the form of the most efficient possible organization is now under discussion.

The chairman gives his view that 'we need to harness the undoubted experience and expertise of those who have served the group for many years with first-class, full-time direction'. Mr Cullingham adds that Price Waterhouse feel the board should consider whether the group's problems cannot be best overcome through the merging of the group with another organization. 'This', the chairman tells shareholders, 'is having your directors' urgent attention'.

The chairman records his appreciation of the assistance of Price Waterhouse and of 'the co-operation and help' of the outgoing group auditors - Silversides, Slack & Barnsley - who have resigned to be succeeded by Price Waterhouse.

The Italian affair apart, the Gascoigne Group's troubles appear to have stemmed from that all too familiar source - inadequate stock control, and one wonders what the situation would have been but for the Adwest bid and the preliminary independent investigation that went with it.

The Stock Exchange quotation for the shares has now been restored.

Laundry Changes

THERE is much to be learned from chairmen's statements with company accounts. For example, the views of Mr Charles Redstone, chairman of Sobranie (Holdings) Ltd, on changing laundry habits is distinctly interesting. One of Sobranie's diversifications, in fact the only diversification, is a laundry group of three companies and the laundry division has had a good year. It is hoped to expand by acquiring 'another large laundry'.

There is a labour problem and Mr Redstone considers that 'it is not sufficiently recognized that laundry employment is certain, well paid, secure, and hygienic'. The labour supply problem is being overcome and it is on the subject of customers that Mr Redstone's comments are particularly interesting. 'It is clear', he says, 'that an increasing number of people have decided that the cost of using a laundry is to be preferred to the trials and tribulations of home or launderette washing, and that the time which has to be devoted to this necessary activity might, for non-specialists, be better spent in other ways'.

Is there a trend back to 'the laundry man' and away from the ever-open launderette and the home washing machine? Or is it that the efficiency of Sobranie's laundry division is such that it conjures up customers where none would have existed before?

Certainly Sobranie is having more success with its laundries than with its search for further new interests. The company is 'offered many propositions - from the impossible to the near impossible - but nothing totally suitable has come up'.

Broxlea

THE chairman of Broxlea Holdings, Mr A. T. Izzard, in his statement with the company's accounts, debates at some length the problems of equating turnover to the company's results. Through its subsidiary, Broxlea Ltd, the company is entirely engaged on subcontracting for the telecommunications and electronic industries.

The accounts show a turnover of £159,934 against £167,632 but an operating loss of £20,007 against a profit of £7,318. Mr Izzard reminds shareholders of his many references in the past to the company's policy of retaining skilled staff during slack periods and the latest profit (or loss) performance reflects 'something of the effect of this'.

The directors' report shows an increase of 5 per cent in total earnings by a slightly reduced average labour force. There is an average increase in wages per employee of nearly 10 per cent. 'The policy of retaining our skilled staff through periods when the flow of orders is uneven', Mr Izzard says, 'is obviously an expensive one, but one which guarantees full and speedy satisfaction of customers' orders when resumed, without the prohibitive cost of engaging and training new labour'.

'At first sight', Mr Izzard comments, 'the turnover figures can be misleading but it must be remembered that we sell practically only skilled labour - in other words a skilled production service'. With the loss, the company drops out of the dividend list and the chairman does not yet foresee a return to it.

John Harper

ONE of the rose-coloured spectacle views of management employee relationships is that telling employees all must shield them from the slings and arrows of outrageous economic and industrial fortune. John Harper & Co, of Willenhall, probably never viewed things this way but they have for long issued a 'man in the street' version of their accounts to employees and this has always been well done.

But this year the report has to open with the statement that the finished products division has had to be closed and the board states its regret at the redundancies entailed. The cost of closing the division was £204,017 which included £44,928 for redundancy and supplementary ex gratia payments to employees.

Mr Wilfred Harper, the chairman, in his statement with the full report and accounts, says that relatively few of the employees in the finished products division found employment in the remaining main foundry division even though many of them had spent all their working lives with the company.

He adds that 'the spirit of co-operation during the closing down period was most noteworthy', which suggests that good management-labour relations (of which the 'man in the street' style report was evidence) served its purpose even though it did not protect employees from the fact of the closure of the division.

Combined English Stores

THE mystery of the Combined English Stores' symbol used in the company's report and accounts, reviewed in 'Finance and Commerce' in the issue of July 30th, has been solved. There was in fact no mystery, merely this column's failure to appreciate the niceties of a symbol which it inexpertly described as 'a blue arrow pursued by a brown arrowhead'.

Combined English Stores' secretary, Mr E. C. S. Large, F.C.A., admits that the symbol looks just like that, which is kind of him. But points out that it was produced by 'a leading designer of symbols' and is 'a stylized "C" and "E" which, when running in front of the word "Stores", is intended to convey an absolutely up-to-date modern symbol of CES'.

Another modern symbol of CES, incidentally, is that Slater Walker have a 12 per cent equity stake in the company as the result of taking up shares issued to Barclay Securities as consideration for the purchase from Barclay of a chain of jewellers' shops. Slater Walker are now financial advisers to CES and Barclay Securities have also retained an investment stake in the company.

Not Apparent

AN exceptional charge of £35,094 in the accounts of The Fruit and Produce Exchange of Great Britain Ltd turns a poor profit year into a bad one. Before the charge, profits were back from £202,568 to £104,300, and after it to £69,206. The charge is part of the loss of the Frank James & Co branch, Birmingham, which ceased trading at the end of July 1969. An estimated amount of £28,500 (£16,500 after tax) has additionally been charged to general reserve, the amount being considered to relate to the period prior to April 1st, 1969.

The directors' report states that the reason for the closure of the Birmingham branch 'was the apparent un-profitability of its then current activities'. But subsequent investigations 'disclosed defalcations, misappropriations and falsification of branch records, in regard to which further inquiries are still proceeding'.

Amalgamated Power

AMALGAMATED Power Engineering Ltd is basically the merger of the W. H. Allen Sons & Co and Belliss & Morcomb businesses, the group being concerned with diesel engines, steam turbines, air and gas compressors, pumps and gears.

The merger effectively operated from 1968 but the recently issued accounts for the calendar year 1969 record the results for the first complete year for all constituent units of the group. During the year the rationalization and concentration programme planned and begun shortly after the formation of the group was largely completed.

In his review, the chairman comments on 'the difficulty of setting out comparative information over a number of years for the group'. The tables provided take the figures back to 1963 except that turnover figures are only provided for the two most recent years and, naturally enough, return on capital employed is also only provided for those two years. The absence of turnover figures for earlier years is indicated in the tables by 'N/A'.

This, rather surprisingly, means 'not available' which presumably means that turnover figures were not recorded in earlier years or that their compilation for recording purposes was so complicated as to be misleading.

A further table in the report provides indices of orders secured by the group by 'rated horse-power' in calendar years, with 1964 as 100. Figures are provided for five years under five headings - compressors, diesel engines, gears, pumps and steam turbines.

CITY NOTES

CURRENTLY the stock-markets are a thing of bits and pieces – the special situations, the bear raids, the take-over propositions – rather than a matter of concentrated movement or trend. Under current conditions that is hardly surprising since trend indicators are extremely difficult to discern.

Attempts to peer ahead bring various and varying forecasts of the economic future and the stock-market in its drabness and its drift reflects the bewilderment of the vast majority of investors – institutional as well as individual.

It is probably inevitable, under such circumstances, that what special points there may be in the market become exaggerated, sometimes wildly exaggerated. The bear raid on Slater Walker shares is one example.

In other 'situations' there may be cause for the anxiety indicated by falling share prices – British Leyland for one, Lesney for another; but even so there is exaggeration.

The level of stock-market turnover, as indicated in the daily recording of bargains, continues to show that many stockbroking firms must still be living on the fat of the 1968–69 boom. There does not seem to be enough business around for every broking firm to be making profits at present.

THE National Institute of Economic and Social Research, Barclays Bank and the Charterhouse Group are three organizations which have recently had a go at economic and financial forecasting, and while all three agree that something needs to be done about prices, wages, inflation and the rest of it, there is no basic agreement on what needs to be done or how the pattern of the economy will work out.

The National Institute, still indulging in forecasts which are so long term that they can rarely hope to be accurate, joins the growth lobby with demands for a greater degree of growth as a means of breaking the price-wage spiral. Either growth or devaluation is how the National Institute sees it.

Barclays Bank regards the whole matter in the light of a change in the pattern of monetary management and of economic thinking and suggests that out of the present apparent chaos will come a greater realization that government expenditure is the true regulator of economic and financial forces. Barclays sees an eventual reduction in government expenditure as the means of economic equilibrium, although not until the wage-price spiral has twisted considerably higher.

Charterhouse Group get back to the old fundamentals and consider that one of the next economic moves will be a rise in Bank rate this autumn. Charterhouse also see a continued and reinforced control of money supply and of credit conditions.

PREDICTABLY, N. M. Rothschild & Co, advisers to Metropolitan Estate and Property Corporation, came out against the take-over offer made by Commercial Union. But Rothschilds came out against it so strongly that Metropolitan Estate's directors might even have felt a little embarrassed. Rothschilds insisted that there was no advantage in the Commercial Union offer compared with the continued development of Metropolitan Estate as a separate company with a strong property investment position and equally strong property development programme. The emphasis on Metropolitan Estate's independent strength is in contrast to that company's apparent eagerness at one time to join forces with the Hill Samuel organization.

THE compensation fund resources of The Federation of Stock Exchanges were brought into operation following the failure of Gilmour Shaw & Co on the Scottish Stock Exchange in July last year. The Federation's report shows that calls were made on compensation funds of all exchanges to the extent of £504,942, with London providing £308,830. The total amount of claims paid up to the end of last June was £504,938 and the final total amount is not expected to differ materially from that figure.

The Future of the Profession

SIR, — The objectors to the English Institute's integration scheme were from time to time accused of being destructive and not constructive. They had to be, as there was a danger that arguments on alternatives would have so muddled the issue that the voting could have gone the other way.

I would now suggest the following outline proposals as a basis for new plans:

- (1) The idea of a single profession should be forgotten: there are several and it is difficult to anticipate any change in the foreseeable future.
- (2) Chartered accountants should remain what they were set up to be — a body of highly-trained and disciplined experts — available to serve the public as auditors, advisers, receivers, liquidators, etc., i.e., they should be basically the profession in public practice.
- (3) The English, Scottish and Irish Institutes should amalgamate in order to provide the strongest possible body with like qualifications, and steps should be taken to integrate those certified accountants connected with public practice as soon as possible.
- (4) The prostitution of the fellowship should be stopped and it should revert to its former use of identifying to the public, senior members with considerable experience in practice.
- (5) It is fortuitous, though gratifying, that the training and qualifications of chartered accountants have been so much sort after by industry and commerce. It is proposed that The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants should change its title and admit chartered accountants to membership immediately upon passing any specialized examinations that might be necessary. It would be appropriate if municipal accountants were also admitted on similar terms. The enlarged Institute so formed would thus look after the special interests of all accountants in industry. Those chartered accountants entering it would, of course, retain the dual qualification so that they could at any time revert to practice.
- (6) The IMTA would remain, as they appear to have decided to do obliquely under the proposed scheme, a body of specialists but with an ability to acquire a wider qualification more simply than at present.
- (7) Plans should be produced for rationalized training and examination syllabuses for all those subjects that are common to two or more of the three bodies. The Institutes should encourage the widest possible training of students but for 'chartered' entrants the emphasis must be on practical experience in a practising office. Post-qualification training, however, should be paid for by the people benefiting from it:

either individuals looking for more remunerative employment or firms seeking specialists to enlarge the scope of their activities. It is not just that the general run of members should have to pay by enhanced subscriptions for training of this kind that does not benefit them.

- (8) Finally, the Institutes should look very carefully at the proposed educational standards for entry. What is required is young people who after practical and theoretical training can pass the professional examinations. It does not follow that because they have been to a university and have degrees in history or biology, or some totally unrelated subject, that they are going to be able to do this. There are still a lot of young people who do not go to universities or even acquire many A levels who are intelligent and hardworking, and would make better accountants than many of the people who are crammed through degrees.

Rationalized along the above lines The Institute of Chartered Accountants would remain the highly respected body that it has always been which would be consulted on company matters, taxation, etc., and other subjects affecting the public. It would be supported, where appropriate, by the enlarged Institute of Cost Accountants. There might, in fact, be a case for a permanent Council containing representatives of all three bodies to act as adviser to the government or other institutions.

Yours faithfully,

London WCr.

E. H. WHITE, F.C.A.

SIR, — Surely one of the inescapable conclusions to be reached is that Mr Hugh Nicholson and Mr Bruce Sutherland are more closely in touch with the views and sympathies of the majority of members of the Institute than are the President and the members of the Council. That must remain for them a chastening thought.

Perhaps the result of the poll will spur them to further effort to implement policies in the real interests of the Institute members.

It is to be hoped that they will not again be tempted to accept the principle that 'if you can't beat 'em, join 'em'.

Yours faithfully,

Barnstaple, Devon.

F. M. YEO, F.C.A.

SIR, — Following the rejection of the proposed integration of the accountancy profession I read with some interest the suggestion by Mr P. H. Eden (The Accountant, August 20th), that steps should now be taken to amalgamate the ACCA, ICWA and IMTA.

Rightly or wrongly the question any member of one of these bodies will ask himself is, 'what do I have to gain from such an amalgamation?'

The IMTA has a virtual monopoly control of the profession in local government. Furthermore, it is incorporated by Royal Charter. Fair incentives, I think, to offer the members of the ACCA and ICWA.

The influence of the ICWA in industry continues to grow, and there can be little doubt that in time to come the control which the IMTA now has in local government will eventually be exercised by the ICWA in industry.

The interests of the ACCA are more widely spread than either of the other two bodies. In fact, the progressive and democratic outlook of the ACCA has in a sense been its greatest handicap. As a result no section of commerce is at present under its control with the possible exception of some nationalized industries. However, it is the only one of the three bodies with full statutory recognition and any member of a newly-formed body would, of course, after a period of experience in a professional office, have full practising rights.

The examination standard set by all three bodies is unquestionably high – in fact, if pass percentages are anything to go by – much higher than those of The Institute of Chartered Accountants. Furthermore, the examination syllabuses are much more closely related than is generally realized.

As Mr Eden points out, an amalgamation between the ACCA, ICWA and IMTA would give a total qualified membership of almost 30,000. Even more important, however, the total student membership would be twice that of the student membership of the three Institutes of Chartered Accountants combined. Furthermore, a new enlarged body with its greater recognition would attract many more students.

There can be little doubt that such an amalgamation would eventually produce the largest and most influential body of accountants in the country.

To my mind the ideal to aim for in the way of training is full-time professional courses at the polytechnics, coupled with a degree course in business studies, the requisite practical experience being gained after qualification.

In order to ensure that the efforts of the last five years have not been entirely wasted, the time has now surely arrived to put our fragmented profession into some sort of order.

Yours faithfully,
S. PAYNE.

London W14.

SIR, – I cannot say that I am disappointed at the rejection of the integration agreement by the English Institute even though I voted in favour of it in the Association's poll. Also I have written to you on two occasions supporting the scheme.

However, during the past month I have come to the conclusion that the scheme as it stood would do nothing to erase from the public mind the confusion which I know exists concerning the difference between the existing accountancy bodies. There would still be accountants who could not use the designation 'Chartered Accountant' because they did not have the necessary 'thirty months' requirement, with the result that there would still be certified accountants, incorporated accountants, etc., and, as has been mentioned before in these columns, many firms would be a mixture of different types of accountant, even though they were all chartered accountants under the scheme!

My purpose in writing this letter is to put forward one or two ideas which may be considered during the review of the situation which is now taking place.

Firstly, it has been suggested by one of your correspondents (Mr D. T. Bailey – August 20th issue) that the ACCA and the ICWA could now 'speedily proceed to the realization of an amalgamation'. To this I would say 'Yes' but with one reservation, namely, that the practising members of the ACCA should be excluded from such a merger. Rather, they should be invited to join the ICA. Similarly, those members of the ICA who are no longer in practice but are instead in commerce or industry, should be transferred from the ICA to the amalgamated ACCA/ICWA.

I can well imagine that the very idea of giving up ICA membership is not likely to find much support at first, as so many chartered accountants seem to think that all other qualified accountants are vastly inferior to them, but if only these people would stop to consider how beneficial it would be not only to them, but to the accountancy profession as a whole, not forgetting the long-suffering public, to have two clearly identifiable bodies, one for practising accountants, the other for accountants in industry and commerce. What possible confusion in people's minds could there then possibly be?

I would emphasize that under my 'scheme' even ICA members who started out in practice, later to transfer to commerce or industry, would be required to surrender their ICA membership in favour of the non-practising body, but provision should be made for such people to be able to re-apply for ICA membership in the event of their returning to practice.

Secondly, I would suggest that the IMTA be left alone, then there would be three distinct accountancy bodies which I feel is far preferable to having the members of all three in one organization, albeit divided into separate streams.

Thirdly, if the idea of a second-tier qualification is to continue, then it should be restricted to the ICA (or its successor) where these 'technicians' are required. Only a single qualification should be provided by each of the other two bodies.

Fourthly, the Government should be approached with a view to introducing legislation requiring smaller accountancy bodies to join their appropriate 'big brothers' and vetoing the setting up of any further such bodies.

Finally, I would suggest that the name 'Institute of Chartered Accountants' no longer be used, as it is the qualification 'chartered accountant' which causes so much confusion in the public's mind. I would suggest instead The Institute of Practising Accountants (designatory letters AIPA); The Institute of Accountants in Industry and Commerce (AIAIC); and, without change, The Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants, unless they wish to go ahead with their plan to create an Institute of Public Finance for the treasurers, in which case the accountants could belong to an Institute of Municipal Accountants (IMA).

Yours faithfully,
Liverpool. COLIN J. TURNOCK, A.A.C.C.A., A.C.B.I.

SIR, – In your editorial of August 20th, you are good enough to quote – whether consciously or unconsciously – from my remarks at the general meeting of the Institute held on June 24th that some members found themselves unable to accept it 'warts and all', and were kind enough to add that 'such attitudes are, of course, irrational'.

Bearing in mind the not insubstantial quantity of reasons why the scheme was not a good scheme which you were kind enough to publish over my signature in your issue of November 2nd, 1968, in your issue of April 24th, 1969, and in almost all your issues published between June 10th and August 6th, I must confess a slight feeling of surprise that your courtesy seems to have extended no further than printing my letters to you and not reading them.

However that may be, I write now to record my support for the letter of my friends Messrs Nicholson and Sutherland in your issue of August 20th, and to enclose a copy of an open letter I have addressed to the President of the Institute [reproduced below], which I hope you will agree is not irrational.

Yours faithfully,

London EC2.

The President,
The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales,

Moorgate Place,

FUTURE OF THE ACCOUNTANCY PROFESSION

DEAR MR PRESIDENT, — Although I may feel that the correct decision emerged from the voting upon the above subject, I cannot but note that no less than 45 per cent of those voting favoured the scheme and some 18,000 did not vote at all. Whilst the vote was decisive, it indicates a significant cleavage in the views of the members of the Institute.

At such a time all who have the interests of the profession at heart must join in mending the breaches that obviously exist and endeavour to help decide the course which should be taken to ensure that, so far as lies within our power, the future of the profession is assured.

Alternative suggestions have been offered (e.g., by Mr C. Anthony Lee at the meeting of June 24th, 1970, and by me in a letter to the Editor of The Accountant, dated June 30th, 1970), and other members have indicated agreement, and disagreement, with parts of the scheme. Suffice to say the opposition to the scheme was not simply negative but as no amendment was permitted to the relevant resolution complete opposition was the only alternative to acceptance of much that was not desired.

I — and I am sure those who were with me in opposition — do not doubt the sincerity of the protagonists. We did not, and do not, agree with them and the voting shows a grievous gap between the Council — of whom presumably a majority favoured the scheme — and the majority of those members who were sufficiently interested to vote. It is not easy to believe that so grave a gap arises solely from the rejected scheme. I am sure, however, that all members would wish to close the gap but first its causes must be fully explored and identified.

You said at the adjourned meeting on August 14th that the Council intended to appoint a special committee to look into the position. I would urge that the committee should not undertake any post-mortem upon the rejected scheme but should examine as widely as possible the gap to which I have referred.

I hope that the long record of — I hope and believe faithful — service to the Institute of those who opposed the scheme will be proof enough of their desire to give any help in their power. For my own part my professional career is inevitably nearing its end, so that I can have no personal interest beyond a desire to give any help I can.

Yours sincerely,

H. O. H. COULSON

SIR, — My Institute has properly refrained from making any observations upon the integration proposal whilst they were sub judice, but now that they have been ignominiously rejected it is perhaps pertinent to state a case.

There was some justifiable concern expressed at the proposal to introduce a second tier within the accounting field intended to represent the technician level, since this was envisaged as the rightful role of my Institute as long ago as 1965 — a concept published in a paper entitled The Future of the Qualified Book-keeper in Modern Accountancy.

The point was made that in the engineering field the basic grades of operative, craftsman, technician and technologist were well-defined and in watertight compartments, with the occupants of each virtually destined to spend the rest of their life therein and restricted to a job within their category. In the book-keeping/accounting field, however, the levels were based on a qualification, rather than a job structure, and the qualified member of the Institute of Book-keepers was logically the technician, with the chartered accountant (or his equivalent) as the technologist. Below the technician there was the unqualified accounts clerk at operative/craftsman level.

It is obviously the duty of my Institute to encourage the 'third tier' unqualified clerk to fit himself for promotion to the second-tier technician level.

Yours faithfully,

D. W. BRADLEY

Secretary

THE INSTITUTE OF BOOK-KEEPERS AND RELATED DATA PROCESSING

London WC2.

SIR, — At last the integration proposals have finally been rejected, and presumably the long post-mortem is about to begin. This will be a shame because too much time (and money?) has been wasted on integration, and the real problems facing the profession ignored.

One of the most persuasive arguments offered for integration was that the Chartered Institute was losing recruits to the other accountancy bodies because it was an 'O' level profession. Recently the Institute published a survey of recruitment [The Accountant, May 21st issue] which said, inter alia, that some of the reasons why school-leavers and graduates did not choose chartered accountancy were the low level of salary paid during training and the boring nature of the work undertaken. Studying in one's own time would be the biggest deterrent if more people outside the profession knew about it. This survey is somewhat remarkable if one considers the publicity it has received — almost none, despite the importance of the subject. But the findings are surprisingly well known outside the profession — any article clerk will confirm that his friends and acquaintances expect him to be underpaid and boring.

I submit that it is in the areas covering article clerks that modernization must be made, and by this I mean education (covering such items as method of studying, and what must be studied) and the general system of articles. The qualified man can for a time be left to himself, already he is responding to market requirements by learning new techniques, and keeping up to date.

Yours faithfully,

Narbonne, France.

The Segregated System of Funds Accounting

SIR, — My article in the Financial Times of August 4th, advocating the adoption of a segregated system of funds accounting has been criticized by a 'Current Affairs' note in your issue of August 13th. Some of this criticism may have been based on insufficient information due to the unfortunate omission of references to the original source. This omission will, I hope, have now been rectified through the correspondence columns of that paper.

I described the segregated system fully in 'An Extension of the System of Accounts: 'The Segregation of Funds and Value', Journal of Accounting Research, Spring 1969, pages 53-89, and summarized and extended it in 'Is Conventional Accounting Obsolete?' Accountancy, June 1970, pages 422-429. The early paragraphs of the Accountancy article provide an explanation of why I described the assets in the conventional balance sheet as outputs of the productive process. In a subsequent article, 'Auditors are not Prophets', Accountancy Age, July 17th, 1970, page 14, I supported the arguments of Sir Ronald Leach against those of Professor Edward Stamp. This may well have your support rather than your opposition, and I have enclosed copies of these papers for your information.

I am not seeking to impugn the professional integrity of auditors. On the contrary, as a correspondent has commented in the August issue of Accountancy, I am attempting to propose 'a practical method of presenting accounts that removes from the auditor's realm much of the material in conventional accounts that has caused them to be the subject of mounting criticism'.

Yours faithfully,

The Management Centre
University of Bradford.

RECEIPTS - Donations received to August 21st, 1970 £1,494 1 1

DEFICIT £734 3 10

A number of the members who have already subscribed have undertaken to underwrite the deficit up to a total of approximately £500, and as we stated in our original appeal we have ourselves undertaken to underwrite the balance of the deficit.

We do, however, feel reluctant to call on any member for more than a maximum of £10 contribution and we now invite any others who may have missed our original appeal and who feel that our endeavours were worth while, to contribute not more than £10 per head to our fund. It will be appreciated if contributors will please make their cheques payable to 'Integration Fighting Fund' and will state clearly their names and addresses so that we can acknowledge them.

If the response to this appeal should produce a surplus we again undertake to pay it over to the Chartered Accountants' Benevolent Association.

Yours faithfully,

HUGH NICHOLSON, F.C.A.

Finance for the Professions

SIR, - I was interested to read Mr Peter Butterworth's letter in your issue of August 13th under the heading 'Wanted - Finance for the Professions'. I feel I should point out two things in relation to the comments on ICFC.

The first is a general matter in that ICFC is not government-backed, if by that it is inferred that government has any part in its financing or operations.

The second is in relation to the need for another institution to provide finance for professional practice. There may or may not be a need for such an additional body but I think your readers should be made aware that ICFC itself does provide money for the expansion of professional practices. Its policy is to deal with a professional practice on the same footing as any other business. Over the years it has indeed financed many professional firms despite its inability to participate in their future profitability.

Yours faithfully,

L. V. D. TINDALE, C.A.,

Value Added Tax

SIR, - The paper presented at the Oxford Summer Course by Mr T. A. Kennedy, Economics Director, NEDO, and reproduced recently in The Accountant is a most valuable and well-balanced summary of the problems which would arise in introducing the tax in this country.

I wonder, however, if he has brought out sufficiently strongly the inefficiency which the administration of the tax necessarily involves. He refers to the 'very real complexities' in administration, and to the fact that between one and two million traders would be involved as compared to the 65,000 now paying purchase tax.

He might have mentioned the abortive labour necessarily involved in requiring all these people to add the tax to their invoices and pay it over to the Government (less tax borne on their purchases) when precisely the same result could be obtained by collecting the tax in one instalment from the final seller of the finished article. (See The Accountant, February 19th, 1970). This is surely a feature of fundamental importance which I suggest is not generally appreciated, nor has yet been adequately answered by proponents of the tax.

Yours faithfully,

Banstead, Surrey. M. G. SPRIGGS, M.A., F.C.A.

SOCIAL EVENTS IN READING

THE Reading Branch of The Chartered Accountant Students' Society of London has arranged an informal cocktail party for representatives of firms in the branch's area at The Ship Hotel, Reading, on Wednesday, September 2nd, from 8 p.m. to 10.30 p.m.

On October 2nd, the branch is holding an informal dance at The Adwest Sports Club, Holme Park, Sonning, Berks, from 8 p.m. to 1 a.m. Dancing will be to the Hal 9000 Discotheque and the bar will remain open until 12.30 a.m.

Applications for tickets (price 5s single, 7s 6d double) should be made as soon as possible to Tony Shepherd, c/o Cook, Sutton & Co, 64-65 St Mary's Butts, Reading. Phone 50261.

EXETER TAX COURSE

THE Exeter and District Chartered Accountant Students' Society has arranged a series of one-day lectures on taxation at The Imperial Hotel, Exeter, commencing at 10.30 a.m. on September 1st. The Society has gone to considerable lengths to present the various aspects of the subject in as interesting a manner as possible and it is hoped that there will be strong student support.

The treatment of the lectures will be allied to examination requirements and time will be taken to work through practical examples and possibly class exercises; in the latter case model answers will be provided. Attention will also be given to planning for the incidence of taxation.

The speakers and their subjects are as follows:

Tuesday, September 1st: 'Capital gains tax', by Mr J. O. Osbaldeston, manager, taxation department, Turquand Youngs & Co, of Exeter, and a past Inspector of Taxes.

Wednesday, September 23rd: 'Income tax', by Mr R. M. Walters, M.A., A.C.A.

Saturday, October 10th: 'Corporation Tax', by Mr J. O. Osbaldeston.

Members who have particular problems on the subject and would like to raise these at the meetings should send brief details beforehand to Mr A. J. Bruce, the organizer, so that time can be made available to discuss them during the course lectures.

Light mid-day refreshments will be provided and the fee for each lecture is £1. Applications should be sent to Mr A. J. Bruce, c/o Messrs Francis S. Clark & Co, 31 St David's Hill, Exeter.

NOTTINGHAM SPORTS FIESTA

HIGHFIELDS Playing Fields, University Boulevard, Beeston, Nottingham, will again be the venue for this year's Sports Fiesta to be held on Friday, September 18th, commencing at 1.30 p.m.

Organized by The Nottingham Chartered Accountant Students' Society, members from student societies throughout the country will compete in a wide range of sporting activities - five-a-side football, seven-a-side rugby football, six-a-side hockey, tennis and golf. It is also hoped to arrange a general handicap sailing race, but this event will be dependent upon general support and competitors supplying their own boats.

Trophies to be won will be: Rugby - The Punters Cup; Football - The Billy Walker Cup and The Going-Scothorne Evans Cup ('The Fiesta Cup') for the overall winners, presented by the Nottingham Society. The present holders of the first two trophies are Nottingham, and London holds the 'Fiesta Cup'.

The fee for those taking part is £1 12s 6d (£1 7s 6d for spectators) plus £1 12s 6d green fee for each golfer.

There will be après-sport entertainment in the evening at The Hippo Club, Bridlesmith Gate, when competitors and supporters can have a three-course meal and beer at reduced prices. Additional entertainment will include 'Boat Races' and a 'Yard of Ale' competition, together with Go-Go girls as well as 'a specially imported selection of Nottingham's most attractive girls'.

Secretaries and sports secretaries wishing to enter teams for the Fiesta should contact immediately, Roger W. Leivers, c/o Pannell Fitzpatrick & Co, 15 Regent Street, Nottingham. Phone 42015.

INSTITUTE HUMOUR?

THE Northern Chartered Accountant Students' Society takes the Institute to task in the current issue of Articles, its periodic journal, for its handling of the May Final examination results.

It is generally acknowledged, says the Society, that a pink form indicates failure and 'there is no need to be told any more', while white indicates success. But on July 20th - at least so far as members of the Northern Society were concerned - there was included with the Institute's letter a list of future examinations - on pink paper. Understandably enough, some students who had, in fact, passed were rather shocked to see the dreaded pink as they nervously opened the envelope!

DISTRICT SOCIETIES' JOINT RESIDENTIAL COURSE

'The practitioner's services to the family company' is the title of the first residential course to be organized by the Sheffield and District Society of Chartered Accountants in collaboration with The Hull, East Yorkshire and Lincolnshire Society of Chartered Accountants.

To be held at the Prince of Wales Hotel, Scarborough, from October 15th to 17th, the course is being presented by partners and senior staff of Pannell Fitzpatrick & Co and will provide an appreciation of the means by which the practitioner may seek to improve the range and standard of his services to the family company. Many of the problems faced by the family company are also encountered generally and the course is designed to be of benefit to the partner or manager who is concerned with the broad range of services which clients now expect from the practitioner, either in an executive or an advisory capacity.

Aspects to be covered will include the use of flow charts - a case study will present an example of one standard system of flow charting as the basis for a practical exercise in the evaluation of audit weaknesses and systems inefficiencies; the means by which the practitioner can advise clients on planning techniques, including for example, simple analysis, and the preparation of budgets and cash-flow statements.

The course fee is £25, and as places are limited to 100 and reservations will be made in strict order of application,

BRITAIN'S ECONOMY IN FIGURES

A new edition of the official pocket guide to Britain's economy has been prepared jointly by the Central Statistical Office and the Board of Trade in co-operation with the statistics divisions of other departments. Britain's economy in figures takes the form of a pocket-sized plastic card and provides a useful aide-memoire for exporters, businessmen, industrialists, educationalists, and others who may want to refer to recent trends in the economy.

Figures from over 60 key economic series during the years 1963, 1968 and 1969 are included and the subjects covered are population and manpower, balance of payments, overseas trade, national income, public expenditure, prices and incomes, production and transport.

Copies are obtainable free from the Central Statistical Office or from regional offices of the Board of Trade and Ministry of Technology.

COURSES AND CONFERENCES

Management Science for Accountants

Designed for management accountants, there will be a three-weeks course on 'Management science for accountants' at the Ashridge Management College from October 5th-23rd. The aim of the course is to enable participants to recognize the uses of operational research, behavioural science, economic theory and computers to their own businesses. They should then be able to develop an information system in which management science is integrated with management accounting.

The depth of treatment will be at an appreciation level suitable for a qualified accountant who has no specialized training in these fields. Lectures and discussions will be accompanied by case material and illustrations drawn from practice.

Applications to attend should be made to the Registrar, Ashridge Management College, Berkhamsted, Hertfordshire; fee for the course is £300, including full board and accommodation at the College. A separate course brochure is available on request.

Executive Training

The P-E Consulting Group has issued a programme booklet setting out details of their executive development courses for the remainder of 1970 and for the first six months of 1971. Although there are no specific courses designed for accountants, there are some on financial management. Generally speaking the programme sets out to educate managers in new skills and to teach them to practise those skills as part of the larger task of managing people in a corporate background.

A useful inclusion in the booklet is a section on industrial training board grants, which summarizes the present policies of the various ITBs on grants for external management courses. Copies may be obtained from P-E Consulting Group Ltd, Executive Development Centre, Wick Road, Egham, Surrey.

Estate Duty

An autumn seminar is being held on estate duty planning at the Royal Garden Hotel, Kensington, London W8, by Analytical Business Services Ltd. It is a two-day course (October 15th-16th), and has been designed especially for the busy accountant as a practical digest of what really matters in current estate duty problems.

The speakers will be led by Mr J. Mowbray, B.A., and will include Mr F. A. Bevis, M.A., LL.B., A.C.A., A.T.I.I. There will be a review of the new law relating to estate duty and its relationship to other taxes; upon the principles considered in lectures on these subjects there will be a case study and practical work by participants in small groups. The second day of the course will be devoted entirely to a comprehensive description of planning techniques with ample opportunity for discussion of problems.

Fee is 25 guineas and applications to attend should be made to Analytical Business Services Ltd, 60 New Oxford Street, London W1A 1ES.

A Credibility Gap

NEGOTIATING the maze at Hampton Court is almost child's play compared with the report on the Pergamon Press affair published last week. That is not meant as a reflection on Price Waterhouse & Co, whose detailed and careful report unfolds for us the involved circumstances and events that led up to the investigation of the affairs of the Pergamon Group covering the year 1968 and the accounts for the nine months to September 30th, 1969.

In the upshot, the net assets of the group at December 31st, 1968, have been reduced at one fell swoop by more than £2½ million to £4,461,000, while pre-tax trading profits have been 'adjusted' from the original published figure of £2.1 million to £495,000. Disillusioned shareholders may well ask how all this has come about.

Hacking one's way through the tangled undergrowth of numerous and complex transactions with the Maxwell family companies and brushing aside the debris left after the realization of Pergamon's loan to, and the majority of its shares in, International Learning Systems Corporation (ILSC), one can slowly begin to piece together the decline and fall from grace of the company founded by Mr Robert Maxwell some 20 years ago.

The main areas of adjustment to the 1968 accounts are as follows:

	Net assets	Trading profit
	£m	£m
ILSC	1.61	0.08
Stocks and work in progress	0.64	0.84
Debtors	0.59	0.31
MSI Inc.	0.20	0.13
Other factors	0.41	0.25
	3.45	—
Less Taxation	0.88	—
	£2.57	£1.61

The above adjustments relate to 1968 (£1.57 million), and 1967 and prior years (£1 million).

One point at issue can be settled right at the outset. These adjustments do not arise from changes in accounting principles except to a minor extent. Price Waterhouse do, however, recommend 'material changes in the way in which these principles have been applied' and which obviously led to the substantial adjustments made in respect of 1968 referred to above.

Nearly half the amount written off net assets is attributable to ILSC. This company was established as a joint venture with The British Printing Corporation Ltd on July 1st, 1967, when both Pergamon and BPC transferred their encyclopedia businesses to the new company. It proved to be a mounting drain on Pergamon's cash resources throughout the 27 months' accounting period under review. Indeed, as the present chairman, Sir Henry d'Avigdor-Goldsmid, Bt, D.S.O., M.C., M.P., remarks:

'Despite the huge sums of money sunk into it, it transpired that ILSC needed a cash infusion of something in the nature of £100,000 a month from each of the participants to keep it afloat. . . . The great infusions of cash . . . were far beyond Pergamon's capacity to continue; they were necessitated by the need to keep on paying out commissions and other expenses in connection with ILSC's overseas sales activities, and without these selling activities it was made clear to the board that there was very little chance of collecting more than a tiny proportion of the outstanding debts.'

Suffice to say, the interest in ILSC was sold to BPC in February of this year.

In a statement issued to shareholders last week Mr Robert Maxwell freely acknowledges his shortcomings with regard to the whole ILSC venture:

'In retrospect, it is easy to see (though disagreeable to have to admit) that the financial and managerial demands of this enterprise exceeded the resources and people made available to this company by Pergamon Press and the British Printing Corporation. This was a grievous error of judgement on the part of the two parent companies, and I freely admit my share of responsibility. . . .'

Turning now to the question of stocks and work in progress, the adjustments appear to stem from a different method used in calculating the net realizable value of stock. By way of explanation, the basis for inclusion of stocks in the accounts each year has been the lower of cost and net realizable value.

In order to assess the accuracy of the provisions to reduce stock from cost to net realizable value, Price Waterhouse recommended new percentage deductions (which have been adopted by the company) in place of the rather more flexible approach taken by the old management – or, as Chalmers, Impey & Co, the outgoing auditors, put it in their qualified report upon the 1969 accounts:

'a rigid mathematical formula has been applied . . . whereas the old management had regard to the large amount and differing make-up of stock involved, and was less rigid in its calculation of a net realizable value of stock where in its opinion special circumstances existed'.

Another matter concerns the trading arrangements with Maxwell family companies, and in particular those with Maxwell Scientific Instruments Inc (MSI Inc.) relating to back issues of scientific and other journals. Prior to 1968, all the costs of printing journals were written off in the year of publication, credit being taken for any back issue sales as they were made and no amounts being included for the stock of back issues. However, on the basis that firm orders existed, back issue stocks were valued for the first time in Pergamon's accounts at December 31st, 1968 – with consequential adjustments insisted upon by Price Waterhouse for back issues in hand at the end of the previous year.

Other minor matters affect the valuation of overseas stocks in the hands of subsidiary companies and the inclusion of certain overheads in work in progress contrary to group policy.

As for debtors, adjustments here range from writing off balances carried forward as a result of book-keeping errors and for goods invoiced to customers which were never delivered, to the absence of any provision for books sold by the end of 1968 which would subsequently be returned by customers, greatly increased provision for doubtful debts, and a strict review of royalty arrangements whereby some advance payments were deemed to be irrecoverable out of earnings.

Leaving the 1968 accounts behind and moving on to consider the accounts for the nine months to September 30th, 1969, there are a number of exceptional items which call for comment.

The pre-tax trading profit for the period is £29,000 (and then only after bringing in £360,000 gross profit on sales of back issues to MSI Inc.) – a far cry from Mr Maxwell's revised forecast for the year of £2 million. This profit is arrived at before charging exceptional items of £1,465,000, consisting largely of provisions against amounts receivable from certain Maxwell family companies and also before making a further provision of £507,000 against ILSC. The directors deemed it prudent to make full provision against balances receivable from MSI Inc., and other Maxwell family companies, since they are in dispute over the terms of certain agreements.

Turning back to the 1968 accounts again, it is reasonable to ask whether all the adjustments brought to light by Price Waterhouse & Co are due to hindsight or change of accounting method. In both situations it is easy to be wise after the event and many of the adjustments do appear to be of this kind, save one – the value placed upon the investment in ILSC. This was a material item in the balance sheet at December 31st, 1968 (£1 million out of total net assets of £7 million). It concerned a new and relatively untried venture – certainly on the scale then contemplated – and a loss in its very first trading period of 18 months would not have been an unusual or unexpected result. Instead, draft accounts purported to show a profit and to cap it all a dividend was declared.

We now learn that the accounts of ILSC for 1968 and 1969 were not finally completed until July 1970.

and for a number of reasons the auditors were unable to express an opinion on them. And yet, the Pergamon auditors were also joint auditors of ILSC. It would seem that they accepted the valuation on the strength of results shown in the unaudited accounts of an associated company. Price Waterhouse point out

'... it is now, in our opinion, clear that Pergamon's investment in ILSC was impaired by December 31st, 1968. ...'

Perhaps the auditors were swayed by the over-optimistic opinions persuasively expressed by the then chairman, but it would seem, at this distance, that the shareholders might have been alerted to possible risk by a qualification in the 1968 auditors' report.

Finally, apart from the fact of non-disclosure, the question remains of the trading relationship of public companies with private companies owned by directors or their families – the full extent of which only came to light during the investigation. This, no doubt, is an aspect the Board of Trade will consider when their inspectors' report on Pergamon becomes available.

Encouragement for Government Contractors

AN announcement that the Government had reached agreement with industry on new arrangements for placing and pricing non-competitive government contracts covered by the existing profit formula was made by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury in February 1968. The aim of the formula was to give contractors a fair return on capital employed, and the yardstick of a fair rate of return was taken as the average of industrial earnings over the years 1960–66.

This was calculated at 14 per cent when using the accounting conventions employed by industry; and the Government considered that this would be satisfied by a rate of about $13\frac{1}{2}$ per cent when based on government accounting conventions. It seemed necessary to keep a differential between the rates for risk work and non-risk work, respectively, and on the premise that non-risk work contributed one-third of the total of profit-formula work, these rates were fixed at 15 per cent for risk work and 10 per cent for non-risk work, giving an average of $(\frac{1}{3} \times 10) + (\frac{2}{3} \times 15) = 13\frac{1}{3}$ per cent.

As previously, only part of the profit allowed (11 per cent and 8 per cent, respectively) was calculated directly on capital employed; the balance being obtained by a norm of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent (maximum 3 per cent) on cost of production, which was believed to average about one and a third times the value of capital employed.

The agreement foreshadowed the setting up of an independent Review Board for Government Contracts. This Board was established on August 1st, 1969, under the distinguished chairmanship of Sir William Lawson, C.B.E., F.C.A., a Past President of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales. The Board's two main functions are: (a) to review individual contracts referred to it; and (b) to make periodic reviews of the relationship between industrial earnings generally and those achieved on government contract work.

The first such review is to cover the years 1969–71; but the Board was asked to make an interim report within one year of government accounting conventions relating to certain items of cost and income and of the validity of the presumptions that cost of production averages $1\frac{1}{3} \times$ capital employed, and that 14 per cent return on capital can be achieved by a $13\frac{1}{2}$ per cent rate based on government conventions.

This interim review has now been published¹ and proves to be a small masterpiece of clear thinking and a triumph of common sense on the part both of the Government and of the Board.

Among more than a dozen recommendations, one that will have wide-spread effect relates to the treatment of depreciation. Hitherto the government convention has been to substitute for the contractor's own depreciation charge the allowances computed for Inland Revenue purposes. In the Board's view, cutting across the Government's objection that there is not uniformity of practice between government contractors, the contractors' own depreciation rates should be accepted for the purposes of attributable costs provided that they are consistent and reasonable.

Further evidence of the Board's distrust of spurious uniformity is shown in its treatment of the elements of capital employed, particularly debtors and work in progress on which it comments 'We see no reason for departments to adjust the value which the contractor puts upon his work in progress, which is approved by his auditors and submitted to his shareholders.'

In another context, however, there will be need for greater uniformity among contractors in the definition and classification of costs, if the formal statement of government conventions which has now been made available is to be amplified into a comprehensive code. In particular, the Board has been given a further year in which to clarify the definition and accounting treatment of marketing and selling expenses; and they are holding themselves available in the continuing discussions between contractors and government departments on the classification and accounting treatment of research and development expenditure.

In relation to the CP/CE (cost of production to capital employed) ratio, the Board finds that this should be increased to 1.36 to 1.0. It also finds that in the period since February 26th, 1968, the target rate of return has not been achieved under existing government conventions, and after the Board's current proposals have been implemented (i.e., August 1st), it recommends that the rate of return on capital employed on risk contracts should be increased from 11 to 12 per cent for the remainder of the period up to the availability of its first three-year review.

There will be some disappointment that the Board has declined to become involved with replacement cost accounting, though the effect of this on government contracts would be a minor facet of a change having widespread ramifications.

This interim report is another significant move in the advance from obscurantism in government contracting and will undoubtedly be read with avidity by all concerned.

Tax Cost Research Project

THE English Institute is giving financial support to a research project on the hidden costs of personal taxation by an award of £250 from the P. D. Leake Trust. The research is being carried out under the supervision of Professor C. T. Sandford, Professor of Political Economy at Bath University, and one of the research team is Mr P. N. Dean, M.A., A.C.A.

The principal aim of the research is to measure and analyse some of the 'compliance' costs of personal taxation, i.e., costs in time and money incurred by taxpayers in the planning and preparation of tax returns and computations and negotiating liabilities with the tax authorities. There is a widespread view that these costs are large and increasing, but no serious attempt has been made to measure them. Even approximate measurement would indicate the cost of operating the taxation system and would provide information helpful in evaluating possible tax reforms.

There will be two complementary approaches to the research. First, a direct survey of personal taxpayers – those with the highest compliance costs being asked a series of detailed questions. Second, a survey of professional tax advisers, notably accountants in private practice and the trustee departments of banks. It is this aspect of the research that some Institute members will be asked to assist. A sample of accountants will be requested to complete a questionnaire and agree to an interview. The kind of information which will be sought is the cost of providing tax services to personal clients, how the amount of tax work has increased in recent years and impressions of those parts of the tax code which impose disproportionately large compliance costs. The information will be strictly confidential to the research team, and no material will be published which in any way makes it possible to identify individual firms.

The Council of the Institute has given its general blessing to the project, and besides financial assistance from the P. D. Leake Trust, the researchers have had the benefit of the advice of a small committee set up by the Institute under Mr Stanley Kitchen, F.C.A., Chairman of the Parliamentary and Law Committee. In a personal message the President writes:

'I commend this research project on the compliance costs of direct taxation and I hope that members approached by Professor Sandford will give him every assistance in his inquiry, which will help to document and support the efforts of the Institute and the other accountancy bodies to bring about simplifications in the present excessively complicated tax structure.'

Tax Reform Discussions at the Treasury

REPRESENTATIVES of the Accountants' Joint Parliamentary Committee, led by Mr C. Croxton-Smith, M.A., LL.B., F.C.A., President of the English Institute, and including Mr G. D. H. Dewar, C.A., President of the Scottish Institute, discussed tax reform in a one-and-a-half-hour meeting last week with the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Mr Patrick Jenkin, supported by Sir Arnold France, Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue.

The discussion arose from previous approaches on tax simplification founded on the three-point plan submitted early in 1968 to the then Chancellor, Mr Roy Jenkins, by the President of the English Institute. The plan called for the overhaul and improvement of the fiscal system, earlier publication and longer pre-second reading exposure of fiscal measures, and the setting-up of a select committee to inquire into new fiscal proposals. After the meeting Mr Croxton-Smith described the talks as 'valuable and informative'.

The joint working party which was set up last year as a result of the English Institute's talks with the Labour Chancellor will continue its meetings at Somerset House to discuss various taxation matters.

The AJPC bodies comprise the English, Scottish and Irish Institutes of Chartered Accountants, The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants, The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants and The Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants.

Lloyd's Results

LOYD'S insurance market must wait a further year before being able to announce a return to overall underwriting profitability. It was the two largest sectors – marine and non-marine – which let down the 1967 account, resulting in an overall loss of 0.27 per cent on premium income of more than £600 million.

Announcing the figures last week, Lloyd's chairman, Mr H. S. Mance, said the trend was very clearly in the right direction and looked as though it would continue to be so. There has been a progressive reduction in first-year settlements from 28.70 per cent (which had increased to 103.09 per cent when the account was closed) for 1966 to 25.99 per cent for 1967, 22.85 per cent for 1968 and 20.08 per cent for 1969. The second-year settlements show a similar trend, from 48.2 per cent and 45.89 per cent for 1966 and 1967, respectively, to 37.81 per cent for 1968.

Third-year settlements are always heavy since they include the reinsurance premiums paid into a subsequent account for the outstanding claim. Nevertheless the downward trend, while not infallible, is distinctly encouraging, and private opinion within the market is that the 1968 account, which will be closed at the end of the present year, will show a worth-while profit.

The better experience should stem the flow of resignations and encourage more men and women throughout the world to become members. In 1969 there were 187 resignations. So far this year 269 applications for membership have been received.

But for devaluation the 1967 account probably would have shown a profit. It worsened the subsequent settlements in foreign currency for that account. Because of the three-year system of accounting, this affected the Lloyd's 1967 account more seriously than it did the companies' accounts, which are on a calendar year basis.

Losses on the ships in the Suez Canal amounted to about £11½ million. But if they should be freed quite soon there might be a recovery of about £2½ million due to underwriters. Some of the cargo on board the ships has appreciated in value while they have been trapped.

Motor business continues to be profitable at Lloyd's with underwriters on their 1967 account making a profit of 10.39 per cent on premium income of nearly £35 million. But the subsequent years will not be so good and increases in premium are imminent – for otherwise the 1971 account could run into serious trouble.

International Tax Burdens

IT is a commonplace that the institutions and customs of different countries vary widely, but one thing they all have in common: that is the propensity to spend and, in recent years, the proportion of their citizens' incomes taken in various forms of taxes has risen steadily.

In the August issue of Economic Trends a brief article with accompanying tables summarizes the state of play in 1968 in the fourteen countries associated within the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development. The percentage of the gross national product at factor cost taken in all taxes, including social security contributions, ranges from 20.3 in Japan and 24.2 in Switzerland to 48.4 in Sweden and 43.2 in Austria.

The United Kingdom figure of 40.1 per cent comes seventh in the ranking of the 14 countries, but given the substantial increases in tax revenues since 1968, a more up-to-date calculation would probably lift the position of this country. Thus, when the social security contributions are omitted from the above comparison, the UK ranks third in respect of taxes as a proportion of the GNP after Sweden and Denmark. The UK figure of 34.2 per cent compares with only 16.5 in Japan and some 27 per cent in West Germany and the USA.

Social security contributions are a more important element in government revenues for most countries than in the UK, where they provide 14.7 per cent of all tax revenues. In contrast, the corresponding figures for France and Italy are 39.3 and 36.4 respectively, and even in West Germany the figure is 30.4. Inevitably, the proportion of such contributions paid by employers is higher than in the UK where their particular contribution accounts for 7.5 per cent of all taxation compared with over 28 and 26 per cent in France and the Netherlands.

Even over the three-year period, 1966-68, covered by the tables in the article in Economic Trends, the acceleration in public sector revenue needs in the UK is especially marked. Between 1966-68 the largest increase in the proportion of the GNP taken in taxes is recorded by the UK, i.e., from 35.7 to 40.1 per cent. Over the same period there was a modest decline in the corresponding figures for West Germany and France, while many other countries registered only very modest increases.

While these figures are prepared, as far as possible, on the basis of standardized returns made to the OECD, their interpretation poses difficult problems. The economic consequences of a given level of taxation will depend on the nature of government expenditure, just as the composition of the tax revenues with differing weights upon employers and households will produce widely differing economic effects. At best the figures should be regarded as only a broad indication of the relative weight of taxation. Even so, they undoubtedly lend support to the growing body of opinion in Britain that an overhaul of the tax system and some effort to curb government expenditure is overdue.

THIS IS MY LIFE

Terms of Reference

by An Industrious Accountant

THERE was an hour to go to the board meeting, and Scotty, our sales manager, sat scowling at the big organization chart of his department. A plan for a two-phased staff reduction of 10 per cent by next summer had been requested (which in this context meant 'demanded') by the managing director, and it was clear that the usual attrition by resignations and retirements wouldn't go even half-way towards meeting the target.

I'd already suggested that his structure was over-elaborate, with too many levels of authority, but Scotty had only nodded casually. That was true, he admitted, but it wasn't enough. Drastic measures were called for. 'When my Dad was killed in the Loos attack back in 1915, he was wearing a brow heavy pack over his overcoat', he said with a cock of his red head. 'I'll aye strip down to the buff for this scrimmage.'

So when he presented his case to the directors he pulled no punches. His first chart showed each selling department by sales, gross profit, and average staff, with his supervisory levels totalled on top. It looked like a huge pyramid of interlocking segments. The second chart showed four smaller pyramids angled quite differently, with four lines leading up from the top of each to the sales manager's box.

'He didn't propose to recruit even a single additional staff member for six months', he declared; 'then he proposed to review the position further.' The gaps left by normal wastage would be filled partly by redeployment, robbing Peter to pay Paul, wherever a section showed a surplus. Answering the MD's sharp query about his basis of measurement of a surplus, remembering the widely different lines we carried, Scotty nodded equably. His third chart would show, later in the meeting, a correlation of profit versus staff pay; and sections not meeting their new ratio requirements would either improve performance fast - or suffer prompt reductions.

His more important measure, he continued, would be the elimination of fringe manpower. His four new divisions must stand on their own feet for outside service functions. He proposed to scrap the marketing policy committee - for a preliminary six months, he added hastily, seeing the flash in the MD's eye - and his own staff selection committee for the same period. Why? Because it wouldn't be needed, he responded bluntly to Prinny, the personnel director, who sat back with his mouth open.

Next, he'd halve his advertising committee whose recent meetings had been largely slanging matches, defer rotational training moves and postpone the projected restructuring of millinery, dresses and lingerie sections. Then, his more efficient under-managers, such as Trevor and Bertie, would take over additional sections when John and old Michael retired in January, thus streamlining the layout and saving executive salaries. He produced a draft sub-chart with multi-coloured alternatives of names and question marks for consideration; he referred to SET savings as supplied by the accounts department - then he shut up suddenly.

Prinny, who was naturally annoyed at seeing such radical personnel and policy changes suggested without prior consultation with himself, was the first to react. This scheme would lead to personnel friction and dissatisfaction, he warned; the loss of promotional outlets and of status committee posts would affect morale; senior men would become worried and restless. A complete re-think was necessary.

Scotty eyed him inscrutably. 'Why yes, sir', he answered, 'but all that's outside my terms of reference. These are problems for the board!'

Income Taxes and Inflation

by J. M. COPE, B.Com., A.T.I.I.

A runaway inflation on the scale of the German experience of the 1920s obviously brings its own special problems, but there does seem to be some evidence, largely from South America, that a higher rate than that experienced in Europe in recent decades can be borne without a complete collapse of the economic, political and social structure. This is not to suggest that a high rate of inflation is desirable or to deny that it produces severe hardship and inequity for some of those subjected to it.

INFLATION now seems to be accepted as a permanent feature of economic life and the recent rise in the rate of inflation has provoked a great deal of political and economic discussion as well as causing some commercial difficulties. The recently published accounts of the Swan Hunter group, for example, reflect the problems of those who undertake long-term contracts at fixed prices.

Some of the consequences of inflation are accentuated by the tax system. For instance, many forms of saving are based on the proposition that the capital invested will neither increase nor decrease in monetary terms (subject only to a predetermined and usually trivial premium on redemption or discount on issue). Thus, debentures and other loans, all forms of national saving, government stocks, building society deposits and shares, and bank deposits exhibit this characteristic. If, therefore, a debenture is issued at an 8 per cent interest rate the whole of that interest will be treated as income and taxed accordingly despite the fact that (as repayment is being made of a fixed monetary amount) the interest must, to some extent, be regarded as compensation for the loss of real value resulting from the fall in the value of money.

Effective rate of return

If the real value of the debenture is declining at a rate of 3 per cent per annum cumulatively, the real return on the investment may be calculated as follows, taxation being assumed at the standard rate:

Nominal interest	£	8.00
Less Income tax at 41.25 per cent ..	3.30
Loss of real capital.. ..	3.00	6.30
	£1.70

As the rate of decline in the value of money is assumed to be constant, the position will be the same each year although the real amount of interest and the real amount of capital will be smaller each succeeding year but remaining in a constant relationship to each other. If the net return is grossed up at the assumed rate of tax, the return on the investment is 2.89 per cent which takes us almost back to Dr Dalton and 'cheap money'.

The rate assumed for the decline in the value of money is not unreasonable in the light of the history of the last 25 years, but now suppose that we are faced with an expectation that it will become 5 per cent in future and remain at that level. Clearly the real return on the investment falls below zero and equally clearly rates of interest will rise (although not to the benefit of those who have already invested at lower rates). Compared with the 2 per cent increase in the rate of decline in the value of money the same net return requires an increase of 3.4 per cent in the rate of interest, viz.

Nominal interest		11.40
Less Income tax at 41.25 per cent ..	4.70
Loss of real capital.. ..	5.00	9.70
		£1.70

The position is even worse if the tax rate exceeds 41.25 per cent and unless the interest rate is increased astronomically the income tax and surtax becomes in effect a wealth tax as it must be paid partly out of real capital. The immediate answer is that people paying high rates of tax do not choose this type of investment, but there are other consequences which will be considered later.

Equities

Turning now to the equity investor, let us consider first the case where, in the long-term, the rise in share prices exactly keeps pace with inflation and the annual dividends rise at the same rate. Given these assumptions, the investor pays income tax and surtax on his dividends but his real capital remains intact so long as he retains the investment. As soon as he sells it, perhaps to switch into something else, he loses by virtue of capital gains tax and it therefore follows that to maintain his capital in real terms the rate of increase in share prices must be greater than the rate of inflation. Thus, if the shares are purchased for £100 and sold one year and one day later (to avoid the short-term gains tax) the necessary increase on a 3 per cent inflation rate¹ is

Proceeds	£ 104.29
Less Capital gains tax at 30 per cent on 4.29	1.29
	£103.00

If the rate of inflation is 5 per cent the result must be

Proceeds	£ 107.14
Less Capital gains tax at 30 per cent on 7.14	2.14
	£105.00

If the capital values rise faster than inflation then the same may be true of the dividends, so that the necessary rise in capital values could be rather less than that shown. However, if money incomes rise in a system of progressive taxation they will eventually move to a higher tax rate band, from which it follows that to maintain real net income the rise in income must also be greater than the amount of inflation. It must be hoped that in such circumstances the rates of tax will be reduced, but Chancellors of the Exchequer are always tempted to retain methods of taxation which result in hidden increases of this type.

One further example must be examined before the argument can be developed. An individual may wish to borrow money rather than lend it and if he does so to enable him to purchase his residence he will be entitled to tax relief on the interest and will be exempt from capital gains tax on any subsequent disposal. Suppose that he borrows on the same terms as the debenture in the first example and that the value of the house increases at an annual rate of 3 per cent which is the same as the rate of inflation. The net cost will then be:

Gross interest	£ 8.00
Less Tax relief at 41.25 per cent $\times$ 7s 9d	2.57
Inflationary gain (no tax)	3.00
	£2.43

The cost is higher than the net return to the lender in the first example and this result is attributable to the differing rates of income tax, it being assumed that the borrower's income is wholly earned. If the rate of inflation rises to 5 per cent then the net cost, on the same assumption, falls to 0.43 per cent, but if the rate of interest rises to 11.4 per cent as in the first example the calculation becomes:

¹ A 3 per cent rate of inflation is not the same as a 3 per cent fall in the value of money but it is convenient to use round figures in these examples and the difference does not invalidate the argument.

Gross interest	£ 11.40
Less Tax relief at 41.25 per cent $\times$ 7s 9d	3.66
Inflationary gain	5.00
	£2.74

It will now be seen that, because of the differential in the tax rates the net cost to the borrower has to be increased to maintain the same net benefit to the lender.

The capital market

The examples that have been given are admittedly of a simplified nature. They do not, for instance, take into account the timing of capital payments and other cash flows which it would be necessary to assess if a particular situation was being analysed. Nevertheless, they do illustrate the basic elements in the impact of inflation and are well enough known to those who plan their investments intelligently. They account, for instance, for the preference for endowment assurances and capital growth stocks among those who are taxed at high rates but, more important in the present context, they also prompt some wider considerations.

The first of these is that the present system and rates of taxation are producing substantial distortion in capital markets. Not only is the relationship between equity shares and debentures completely altered in net of tax terms as compared with gross terms, but the interest factor necessary to compensate for the erosion of real capital is possibly twice the amount of the rate of inflation itself. This multiplication is also reflected in the downward movement of the price of long-term securities if they are bought and sold at a time when the general rate of interest has risen as compared with that ruling at the time of issue.

As taxation seems to be the main distorting factor, does the answer lie in a recasting of the present tax system as applied to these types of financial activity? The Royal Commission which reported in 1955 certainly felt that inflation could be a matter of vital importance in constructing a tax system. They said (in paragraph 23):

'We have taken it as our general premise that there will not be any marked increase or decrease in the purchasing power of money in the United Kingdom. It would be absurd to assume a complete stability of purchasing power in the future, nor do we need to do so for the purposes of any recommendations that we make. Nor again do we require to assume that there will be no sudden and temporary variations. But if we could not take it as our premise that stability in purchasing power is the normal thing to be expected, we think that our review would be beating the air, for there would be lacking a condition that is a necessary assumption upon which to build either a satisfactory tax structure or a satisfactory distribution of the total burden of tax. Indeed, if we had thought that we were obliged to assume a persistent decline in the purchasing power of money, professional money management is all about.

Keeping abreast of market trends—both at home and overseas—is an integral part of the completely professional investment system employed by The Eight Men from Edinburgh, the particularly shrewd team who manage investments for Edinburgh Securities.

In this role, they are responsible for various portfolios (including those of two comparatively new unit trusts, CRESCENT INTERNATIONAL FUND and CRESCENT INCOME FUND) with a combined value of approximately £50,000,000. It is imperative, therefore, that they not only know what is happening in the stock markets of the world, but also what is likely to happen.

To ensure their knowledge and awareness is wholly up-to-date, the atmosphere in which they work is designed to encourage the interchange of information and ideas. Each portfolio manager, for instance, has his own sources of information. They feed this information to each other in the course of normal daily contact, and also formally every week when all Eight Men meet to discuss market situations, examine trends and formulate policy in greater depth.

Of course, having the information is one thing. Knowing how to exploit it is another. And that's why professional advisers often place the management of their investments in the hands of professional specialists—like The Eight Men from Edinburgh.

even if only a slow one, our examination of the problem of dealing with the inflationary element in profits which are computed without allowance for the decline would have started on a different basis and might have reached a different conclusion'.

This quotation refers specifically to profits but perhaps a wider view can be taken. The possibilities of amending the tax system generally to accommodate inflation seem to fall under three heads.

(1) Rates of tax

It is clear that the problem is accentuated by high rates of tax and that a reduction in rates, particularly in the very high ranges, would effect a partial cure. Nevertheless, the scope for improvement here is limited in practical terms and to have any real effect it would involve substantial reductions in surtax. It may be noted that the examples given above assume a rate of tax no higher than the present standard rate of income tax.

(2) Definition of income

Another aspect of the problem is that in the context of present financial institutions all interest is defined as income whether or not it does no more than compensate for the erosion of invested capital. In contrast the capital growth of equity shares, which may wholly or partly do precisely the same thing, is taxed as a capital gain at a much lower rate, and then only when the investor provokes the liability by selling his shares (or dying). Furthermore it is possible to arrange investments so that the whole of the reward arises as a capital gain even though this may, in effect, cover the inflationary gain, the income element and any real gain all together. It has often been suggested that capital gains tax should not be levied on inflationary gains, but it appears that this is by no means the greatest of the apparent injustices of the present system and that it does in fact serve to lessen the distortion as between debentures and equities.

(3) Differential rates of tax

If, in fact, investors can choose freely between loans and equities is it possible to justify the discrepancy in tax rates between the various rewards that result? Perhaps we are getting near to the point where it is no longer easy to justify the distinction between a capital gain and a flow of income given the existing financial institutions. A Canadian Royal Commission on Taxation, reporting in 1966, said:

'A dollar gained through the sale of a share, bond or piece of real property bestows exactly the same economic power as a dollar gained through employment or operating a business. The equity principles we hold dictate that both should be taxed in exactly the same way. To tax the gain on the disposal of property more lightly than other kinds of gains or not at all would be grossly unfair.'

'These radical reforms are advocated because equity can be achieved in no other way, because in our opinion there would be no adverse economic effects through their adoption when combined with our other proposed changes, and because they would simplify the tax system and reduce uncertainty'.

It may be noted in passing that an essential part of the Commission's proposals was a substantial reduction in marginal rates of personal tax, together with liberal provisions for averaging income over the years and for loss relief. The reduction in marginal rates would be particularly important as a high rate, as has been seen, would be effectively a tax on wealth, in so far as it would have to be paid out of real capital.

Paper profits

Although these suggestions may reduce the distortion and inequity illustrated by the examples none of them go to the heart of the matter which is inflation itself. Why should anyone be taxed on a mere paper profit, whether in the form of part of an interest payment or of a capital gain? If the solution is sought in terms of tax relief alone the apparent answer, at least in theory, would be to allow relief to the extent that real wealth has been eroded by inflation. Provided that the distinction between capital gains and income was abolished it might be possible to devise an equitable method using standard indices. Nevertheless, serious complications, especially in the transitional period, would be unavoidable and the small investor particularly might find it very difficult to understand the system and to make sound investment decisions in the light of it.

If there are to be complications anyway there would seem to be grounds for arguing that reform should not be confined to the tax system but should take the more fundamental line of reconsidering the financial arrangements which are at the root of all these difficulties because of their failure to take inflation into account. It should be remembered that our present financial institutions were devised at a time when rates of personal taxation were negligible, and when the value of money was more stable than it is now. A debenture could then be issued on the basis that real capital was being maintained and that the interest was therefore clearly of the nature of income in the conventional sense. This is no longer the case and it is doubtful whether, if the debenture did not already exist, it would be invented today in the form that we know. Why should people lend money on the basis that the value of the investment will fall and that the compensation for that loss of value will be heavily taxed as if it were spendable income?

If we criticize the debenture and loan as being no longer appropriate in their present form rather than criticize the tax system which is based on the same outdated financial concepts we may be nearer to finding an ultimate solution. To produce a nationally acceptable standard index of inflation would seem to present few difficulties, but if it is accepted that the unstable currency unit can no longer serve for certain financial purposes then many other related aspects must also be reconsidered. This brings us directly to the question of accounting profits and it is interesting to note the views of the Institute of Chartered Accountants in the Recommendation N.15 on Accounting Principles. Their comments include the following (paragraph 26):

'A conception based on the index method would raise the whole question of the effect of changes in the purchasing power of money on rights expressed in monetary terms. Important economic and social issues would then need consideration . . .

'(a) whether there should be legal recognition of changes in the purchasing power of money so as to adjust legal rights which have been expressed in terms of money: for example investments in government and other stocks and shares, rents under leases, pensions, insurance policies, debentures and other liabilities, rights under service agreements and profit-sharing schemes to incomes which are dependent on or vary with profits, and the relative rights of life-tenants or remainderman.'

Thus the Institute recognizes the relationship between accounts prepared for those who have invested in a business and the nature of the legal rights of those investors. There does, however, seem to be an implication that existing legal rights would be altered but this seems difficult to justify in the present context of historically high interest rates which reflect the investors' expectation of inflation. The answer may lie in a new form of debenture which endeavours to stabilize the real value of the capital invested and which will gradually replace the existing type as and when loan finance is increased or renewed.

The same recommendation continues as follows:

'(b) the determination of prices of goods and services, particularly the question whether a new conception of profit would make it necessary for prices to be raised in order to enable a business to pay a fair return to investors, or indeed to make a profit at all; in other words whether the effect would be to cause a further fall in the purchasing power of money and thereby aggravate the problem.'

The functions of money

Leaving aside the implications that some prices are too low because the proprietors of businesses are being misled as to their true profitability and that such prices should be kept low to control the rate of inflation, this extract does seem to confuse the two quite separate functions of money, as a unit of exchange and as a measuring device. The former, which is its primary function, does not raise the sort of problem discussed in this article even in times of inflation. The latter is recognized as having severe defects and it is now quite normal to find that in government and other statistics comparisons over time are made on the basis of adjusted monetary units. No attempt to produce a constant value monetary unit is perfect but the use of indices produces much better results than merely to use a unit of measurement, be it the pound sterling or any other currency, which is so clearly defective for purposes of measurement.

The next part of the recommendation deals with the taxation implications.

'(c) the relative position for taxation purposes of different kinds of businesses and of persons having money incomes, including employees and pensioners of businesses. In the United Kingdom the basis and scale of taxation seriously restrict the extent to which monetary profits may be retained in businesses to meet the increased capital requirements imposed by diminution in the purchasing power of money. A new conception of business profits designed to alleviate this situation would raise the question of what is the proper taxable income of other classes of taxpayer; in a period of rising prices it would relieve businesses of a large amount of taxation and would therefore raise the further question of how the burden of that relief is to be distributed over other taxpayers'.

It will be borne in mind that this paragraph was written before 1965 when the system of company taxation was changed and a capital gains tax introduced. It seems to concentrate on the relationship, between the taxation of business profits and of other incomes, but it is hoped that the reader who has followed the argument so far will agree that the problem is less one of re-allocating the tax burden than of correcting inequities in the existing system. The fact that there is now a significant degree of inflation and that this may increase means that this is precisely the time when concepts of taxable income should be questioned and, if necessary, adjusted to give a more equitable result.

Index of inflation

Suppose now that it could be agreed that the amount of a loan or debt, as we now know it, merely represented a statement of the cash paid over, reflecting the use of money as a unit of exchange but not of measurement, and that the measurement of that debt should be effected by applying an index of inflation to the cash paid over initially, so that the result would represent the amount of money required to pay off the loan at each point in time at which it was calculated. If loans were expressed in this way the lender could expect to receive back an equivalent value to that which he lent (unless the borrower became insolvent) and the market rate of interest would be much reduced, becoming again interest in the classical sense of a payment for the use of a constant amount of capital. It should be noted that if the capital value increases year by year in monetary terms then the interest payments, although a constant percentage of that capital, will also increase if they are to maintain their real value.

Such a system would have far-reaching effects although those effects should be recognized as a correction of tendencies that have developed gradually over many decades rather than a change to a completely new system. It would mean, for instance, that a company could not forecast its obligation to redeem debentures in a future period in monetary terms, but this may be contrasted with the present situation in which a company can forecast the monetary commitment but finds that the real commitment depends on the future rate of inflation. The new system would also affect the capital gearing of companies (and the position of unsecured creditors) but it should be remembered that if the loan capital redemption commitment is increased monetarily, the rate of interest will be reduced. In so far as the increased capital repayment would not be tax deductible the company might appear to be worse off, but if the effect of inflation is also reflected in the method of computing taxable profit this is likely to be smaller so that the full effect on profit will depend on the circumstances of the particular case.

These and many other points could be developed at great length and not least of the questions arising is whether the proposed changes would accentuate any tendency towards an increased rate of inflation. An important factor to bear in mind throughout is that the changes would affect different people and companies in different ways and that they would react to them and change their financial policies accordingly, just as many did in response to the tax changes in 1965. The only people likely to suffer, except in a transitional period, would be those who are able at present to take advantage of the inequities that are accentuated by or arise from the taxation system. It is not obvious that the proposals would inevitably make life more difficult or complex than it already is once the new ways of thinking about finance had been assimilated.

What does the Merchant Banker expect from the Accountant? - III

by CHARLES I. BALL, F.C.A

Forecasts

IN statements made by chairmen on their annual accounts a comment is frequently made on the prospects for the ensuing year. These statements do not normally come within the responsibility of the auditors, who might, however, consider the extent to which they should examine a forecast which may appear in such a statement. It can be embarrassing to all concerned if a forecast given by the company cannot be substantiated a short time later in accordance with the requirements referred to below.

52. Some years ago as take-over bids became more frequent and defence tactics more versatile, the use of profit forecasts grew in importance and a number of these did not turn out to be justified. The degree to which forecasts were examined by the auditors varied considerably. The forecasts were made by and on the responsibility of the directors and, in many cases, it was felt that the auditors, who were not always asked to examine the forecasts, were not in a position to pass judgement on the future. In view of some of the failures to achieve the forecast profits, further examination of this problem was made when the first edition of the City code was being prepared. After discussion between the working party compiling the City code and The Council of the Institute of Chartered Accountants, it was agreed that auditors or consultant accountants should report in writing to the directors of the company on the forecasts and the assumptions upon which they rested. It was perhaps surprising that the accountancy profession was prepared to do this in view of the commercial problems of looking into the future, but no doubt it was thought better and in the interests of shareholders generally that a genuine attempt should be made rather than to run away from the problem.

53. Some forecasts still tended to go astray and it then became apparent that qualifications may have been contained in the written report to the directors, but which were not made public. It was therefore felt that if the report was to serve a useful purpose it must be contained in the offer documents and this rule was incorporated in the revised City code which was published in April 1969. It should be pointed out that merchant banks also have to make their report in the published documents.

54. The fact that a forecast has proved to be over-optimistic does not necessarily mean that it was not properly made. In the case of a successful defence against a take-over there may have been circumstances outside the control of the board such as changes in legislation or subsequent events such as strikes which prevented the fulfilment of the forecast. The publication of the assumptions are therefore a protection to the directors and the accountants when circumstances have changed for the worse after the preparation of the forecast. Where the take-over has succeeded some bidders like to show that their victim has not lived up to the profit forecast put forward at the time of the battle. It is probable that recriminations of this kind do more harm than good in building a satisfactory relationship between both companies, but the cause of the shortfall may be a change in accountancy basis by the bidder, the management of the biddee may have been displaced, or there may even be a more simple solution that both companies have included in their forecast projections of sales to the same customer, which after the bid must lead to disappointment on one side or the other. This does not vindicate all failures by a company to achieve a forecast but emphasizes the need for a statement on the risks in making the forecast together with the assumptions on which it is made, followed if necessary by a full explanation of the reason for failure. A board which has been caught out once may find that the confidence of shareholders has become strained if a forecast is required on a second occasion.

55. In its report for the year ended March 31st, 1970, the panel stated that it would be a retrograde step if profit forecasts had to be prohibited as a consequence of failures to meet such forecasts, as they consider that the directors' opinions on the immediate future profitability of a company are useful to shareholders in the decision whether or not to accept an offer. They are, however, keeping records of forecasts and related results and in pertinent cases will invite detailed explanations of forecasts that have been missed. It is to be hoped that this examination will be limited to the more glaring cases as a witch-hunt instigated by the panel or by the press could soon lead to the abolition of all forecasts through the fear in the minds of professional advisers of subsequently being proved wrong.

56. Take-overs are now getting so numerous that companies frequently ask merchant banks how they may be prevented. This aspect raises many important questions but, for present purposes the most relevant is the action to be taken when a bid is received. In this connection co-operation between the merchant bank and the accountant can be vital as it is important that the financial information available to the company is up to date at all times so that it can be used at short notice in defence of a bid. The main statistics required for this purpose are the forecasts prepared for internal management control. These should be prepared for periods as far ahead as possible, bearing in mind the nature of the business and should be up-dated as soon as forecasts for an earlier period are turned into actual results. The experience in this assists management in the normal running of the business and also gives more credibility to a forecast for a future period. The accountant can be of considerable assistance in helping the company to prepare the information required. Time will almost certainly be short when a forecast is required so the more work that can be carried out in advance as normal routine the better.

57. Rule 14 of the revised City code begins:

'Shareholders must be put into possession of all the facts necessary for the formation of an informed judgement as to the merits or demerits of an offer. Such facts must be accurately and fairly presented and be available to the shareholder early enough to enable him to make a decision in good time.'

To comply with this rule a statement on profit projections should be considered, but there are a number of occasions when, for tactical or commercial reasons, the directors do not wish to publish the information or it may be impossible to provide or substantiate a profit forecast. The decision as to the amount of information given will normally be arrived at on the advice of the merchant bank.

Procedure on forecasts

58. Part of Rule 15 states:

'... Notwithstanding the obvious hazard attached to the forecasting of profits, profit forecasts must be compiled with the greatest possible care by the directors whose sole responsibility they are.'

'When profit forecasts appear in any document addressed to shareholders in connection with an offer, the assumptions, including the commercial assumptions, upon which the directors have based their profit forecasts, must be stated in the document.'

'The accounting bases and calculations for the forecasts must be examined and reported on by the auditors or consultant accountants.'

'Any merchant bank or other adviser mentioned in the document must also report on the forecasts. The accountants' report and, if there is an adviser, his report, must be contained in such document and be accompanied by a statement that the accountants and, where relevant, the adviser, have given and not withdrawn their consent to publication.'

'Wherever profit forecasts appear in relation to a period in which trading has already commenced, the latest unaudited profit figures which are available in respect of the expired portion of that trading period together with comparable figures for the preceding year must be stated. Alternatively, if no figures are available, that fact must be stated.'

59. In practice, a forecast is deemed to include an estimate of profits for an accounting period which has expired, but in respect of which the results have not previously been announced. The current accounting period is naturally dealt with, and providing a sufficiently significant part of the current period has elapsed, a forecast can be made for the next following accounting period. The reliability of the forecast will depend on the period covered by it and on the particular circumstances of the business operated by the company.

60. It will be noted that the forecast must be reported on by the auditors of the company or by consultant accountants. In most cases the auditors will be requested to act and their knowledge of the company should assist them in carrying out work on a time-table which will almost certainly be tight. The possibility of another firm being appointed can be useful, particularly if a conflict might arise. For example, the same firm might be auditors of the attacking and defending company and notwithstanding the normal rules of professional confidence, the defence might feel that it would be more prudent to employ another firm to examine the forecast.

61. The main points which reporting accountants should consider are set out in a memorandum issued by The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales in April 1969. Some of these aspects have already been dealt with, but the following questions should be considered by the accountant:

- (1) Have forecasts been made in the past and if so have they proved to be reliable? This will help the accountant to assess the extent to which it is necessary to delve into details. Also he must distinguish between business plans or targets which the management hope to achieve, and budgets which may have been prepared for other purposes. Within the company these may all be classified as forecasts and yet their likelihood of achievement may be very different.
- (2) Are the assumptions made by the directors justifiable in the circumstances? An offer may have been made when profits are depressed and the share price low and the directors in fighting the bid will naturally wish to be as optimistic as possible. A forecast may therefore be made on the assumption of better trading conditions and, although the calculations leading to this forecast can be checked and found to be correct, the reasoning may be faulty. The accountant is not strictly reporting on the validity of the assumptions themselves, but he cannot ignore them and in practice will probably assist in their compilation.
- (3) Have any interim figures been prepared for an expired part of the period covered by the forecast? If the forecasts or budgets have been broken down into monthly or quarterly periods it is useful to be able to check progress to date. The evidence from this will assist the accountant in passing judgement on the assumptions.

- (4) Can the volume of goods which comprise the estimated sales be produced by the company? Forecasts have been made where the optimism of the sales manager was not matched by the productive resources and the forecast was, therefore, incapable of achievement.
- (5) Is the working capital sufficient to finance the forecast turnover? In a defensive forecast the turnover will probably be estimated at a higher figure than that ruling in the previous year but the finance to cover this turnover will not necessarily be available. It should therefore be established that the necessary facilities have been confirmed by the bank or other lender.
- (6) What contingencies should properly be provided? In the case of a defence it may be just as inappropriate for the directors to give too low a forecast, therefore encouraging their shareholders to sell their shares at the wrong price, as to give too high a forecast which will not be achieved. Caution can be built in at each stage of management decision and it is important to see that this has not been taken to extremes. A compromise solution may be to give a high and a low projection, rather than using one figure only.

62. The treatment of overseas profits can cause problems unless preparation is done in advance. There may be sizeable minorities and so far as the overseas subsidiary with its own management is concerned there need not necessarily be any change in routine just because the parent has received an offer. The basis of a profit forecast should naturally be consistent throughout the group and, unless the procedures are carried out regularly, time may not permit overseas figures to be examined with the same care as is applied to the parent in this country. If the overseas figures are not particularly large this may not matter, but in some cases the operations abroad have exceeded in size those of the parent here. An audit report allows for the inclusion in group accounts of a reference to subsidiaries which have not been audited by the parent company's auditors. In the case of an offer, however, it is the auditor or consultant accountant who signs his report on the group as a whole. This emphasizes the advisability of subsidiaries at home and overseas carrying out the same budgetary control systems as the parent so that forecasts on a uniform basis can be prepared quickly in case of need. This applies equally to the potential offer or company as to the offeree.

63. When statements in regard to prospects have already been made in annual accounts by the chairman of a company, it is not sufficient to repeat them in offer documents without corroboration. If such statements have been made the merchant bank must decide whether the chairman's remarks should be repeated or brought up to date or even omitted. In cases of doubt the merchant bank may have to clear the matter with the panel. The nature of the circumstances will decide which method is adopted, but if the statement already made is not substantiated, the panel may be concerned that the remarks would be repeated and commented on in the press, thus leading indirectly to a profit forecast without the fulfilment of the usual processes.

64. The report which is made by the merchant bank in an offer document might appear to cover the same ground as that of the reporting accountant but the background is, in fact, different. There is no statutory form of either report, but The Institute of Chartered Accountants in its memorandum referred to in paragraph 61 above has drafted a specimen report for the accountant to state that he has reviewed the accounting bases and calculations of the forecasts and that the forecasts, as far as the accounting bases and calculations are concerned, have been properly compiled on the footing of the assumptions made by the board and are presented on a basis consistent with the accounting practices normally adopted by the company. The merchant bank usually reports that, in its opinion, the directors have taken into account the considerations which are relevant. In spite of the limitations contained in both reports regarding the work carried out and although it is usually stated that the directors are solely responsible for the forecasts, there is no doubt that shareholders consider that the report is equivalent to a report by an auditor on the annual accounts of a company. There are dangers in this as the resulting forecast is given the same degree of exactitude as profits already earned, but it is hard to see how this problem can be solved once it is accepted that a forecast, even if not wholly reliable, is better than not making one at all. In the USA forecasts are not allowed to appear in company documents although unofficial forecasting certainly exists and the investment analysts appear to have a more informed view of prospects than is the case here.

65. In addition to making his report the accountant has to write a letter addressed to the company giving consent to the publication of the report. This gives authority to the accountant to see the whole text of the circular so that he can satisfy himself that it is appropriate for his report to appear in the form and context in which it is included.

Conclusion

66. In conclusion it may be pertinent to summarize some aspects which have been dealt with above and others of a general nature:

- (a) Where there is the slightest possibility of a private company going public at any time in the future, it cannot be too strongly emphasized that stock sheets, including the rough stock-taking records, should be kept for at least ten years. This applies also to other important company documents. Insufficient evidence to support the profits of the period under review may lead to delay in quotation and it is probable that the Stock Exchange will take an even stricter view of qualifications in accountants' reports than they have done in the past.
- (b) In reviewing the prospects of a company the emphasis is primarily on profits and liquidity is often ignored. A deficiency of cash, particularly at the time of a credit squeeze, can be embarrassing even when profits are being earned. If some companies had paid more attention to their expected cash flow over the following year they could have saved the appointment of a receiver or liquidator. Although merchant banks will do their best to help providing the problem has not been left until too late, the advice that can be given by accountants on this matter can be invaluable.

- (c) If accounts were prepared on the basis that a take-over bid was expected to be received the following week, shareholders would receive a lot more information on their company. The merchant bank is also in a much better position to advise on the defence tactics to be adopted when the shareholders feel they have been kept fully informed in the past. It so often happens that the shareholders find that, on the receipt of the bid, the company appears to be much more prosperous than anyone had ever imagined and this sudden change in fortune is not always believed. Some companies discuss their annual accounts and chairman's statement with the merchant bank before publication and this can certainly help to ensure that nothing is said which might make a defence unnecessarily difficult.
- (d) Profit projections should be prepared as normal routine. Auditors should help in establishing the systems so that if a report is required at short notice it can be done. This applies not only to those companies which might receive an offer, but also to those who might make the offer. As the initiative is with the offeror he can time his offer when a forecast, if needed, is readily available. The offeree, on the other hand, is likely to be caught at a most inconvenient time.

- (e) Auditors are in a good position to assess the management of a company. If there has been a close relationship between auditor and merchant bank, much useful service can be done jointly in pointing out weaknesses and suggesting remedies.
- (f) Merchant banks are jealous of their reputations and will not act for a company unless there is mutual confidence. This confidence must also exist between the auditor and the merchant bank, whose interests in giving impartial advice to their joint clients are identical. The advice is more likely to be successful if they understand the duties and the problems of each other.

Taxation Cases

*Full reports of the cases summarized in these columns will be published, with Notes on the Judgments, in
the 'Annotated Tax Cases'*

Skinner v. Berry Head Lands Ltd

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division)
July 18th, 1970

(Before Mr Justice Goff)

Income tax – Sale of land – To parent company – Whether assessable on market value – Whether agreement with Inspector – Income Tax Act 1952, sections 479, 510.

On April 1st, 1960, Wimpole Industrial Finance Co Ltd contracted to purchase all the shares in the company for £32,277, and on the same day the company contracted to sell certain land to Wimpole for £4,175. On the same day Wimpole contracted to sell the land to Marina Properties (Torbay) Ltd for £40,000. Next day there was a conveyance by the company to Marina at the direction of Wimpole. The market value of the land was £40,000. The company was a land-dealing company, and Wimpole a finance and share and land-dealing company. The company had acquired the land for £3,575.

On November 15th, 1961, an assessment for 1961-62 was made on the company in the sum of £300, and there was an appeal on the ground that it was not in accordance with the accounts, 'which should reach you by February 28th'. On July 9th, accounts and computations for 1959-60 to 1963-64 were submitted, and showed the transaction at the actual figures. On July 25th, 1962, the Inspector asked for details, including whether the transactions were at arm's length, and by mistake he was informed that they were. On August 14th, the Inspector referred to the sale of the shares in the company; inquired how the sale of the land could have been at arm's length; and was frankly told that it was not, but that as Wimpole was a dealing company, no issue arose. On November 8th the Inspector agreed the computations. The 1962-63 assessment would be £446, less losses of the same amount, and the appeal against the 1961-62 assessment would be determined under section 510 in the sum of £148 less £148 losses. At that time the Inspector did not know that all the transactions had been on the same day, but he did know this before the 1962-63 assessment was made.

On October 22nd, Wimpole supplied its accounts and computations. On November 15th, the Inspector asked for the dates of the purchase and sale of securities, land and properties, and this was given on November 19th. Two days later the Inspector made an assessment of £500. It was appealed against, and on December 11th, the Inspector wrote 'With reference to your appeal ... details of the adjusted assessment are shown overleaf', and that showed £446 less losses of the same amount.

On July 29th, 1964, the Inspector wrote that in reviewing the case he had found that the land had been sold to Wimpole for £4,175 and had been resold for £40,000; that the companies were under common control; and that following the decision in the Petrotim case he proposed to substitute the market value for 'the nominal transfer price'.

It was contended for the company that the sale to Wimpole was in the ordinary course of trade, and was not one in which the market value of the land should be substituted for the sale price. It was also contended that the question had been settled with the Inspector so that section 510 of the Income Tax Act 1952 applied. The General Commissioners decided the first question in favour of the company, and therefore did not decide the second question.

Held: the market value of the land should be substituted; and there was not an agreement within section 510.

Central Press Photos Limited v. Department of Employment and Productivity

In the Court of Appeal – July 23rd, 1970

Selective employment tax – Photographic agency – Photographs sold to Press – Whether part of newspaper and periodical publishing – Whether commercial photography – Selective Employment Payments Act 1966, sections 1, 10 – Minimum list headings 486, 899.

The company has an establishment in Fleet Street, where it carries on a press photographic agency, and where forty-five people are employed including an editorial staff. The company sends photographers to places where news is likely to arise. The photographs are developed and printed, and captions put on, and sold to newspapers. The photograph is paid for only if it is published. The fees and conditions of supply are controlled by agreements with newspaper associations.

For the company it was contended that its activities fell under minimum list heading 486, 'Printing and publishing of newspapers and periodicals'. For the Department it was contended that the company's activities were under heading 899.2, 'Commercial photography'; and were therefore excluded by section 10 (5) from heading 486. The Industrial Tribunal decided in favour of the Department.

In the Court of Appeal an affidavit by the General Secretary and Chief Executive of the Institute of Incorporated Photographers was put in without objection by the Department. The affidavit showed that a press photographer uses his camera in the same way as a reporter uses his pen; and that his form of activity is different from that of commercial photographers.

Held (reversing the decision of the Queen's Bench Division): the company's work was within heading 486, and the company was entitled to repayment.

Gable Construction Company Limited v. CIR

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division) – April 10th, 1968

(Before Mr Justice GOFF)

Stamp duty – Lease – Variation deed – Alteration of rent – New lease or agreement to increase rent – Whether lease or tack – Whether bond, covenant – Limitation of duty – Stamp Act 1891, section 77 (5), Schedule 1

The company held a lease for 999 years at a rent of £1,500, and it was paying a premium of £67,000 by instalments of £1,000. The company also held another lease for 999 years at a rent of £500 a year, and was paying a premium of £18,000 by instalments of £1,000. The instalments were payable for a very short period, and afterwards the full balances became payable. Both leases were duly stamped.

By a deed of variation dated July 1st, 1963, the premiums were reduced to £53,600 and £14,400 respectively, and the rents were increased from December 25th, 1963. For the period ending December 25th, 2013 the rents were increased from £1,500 to £2,700 and from £500 to £800 respectively, and thereafter they were to rise by a further £960 and £240 respectively at the end of every 50 years. The total reduced premium was to be paid in 68 instalments of £1,000 each.

For the Inland Revenue it was contended that the variation deed operated as a surrender of the old leases and the grant of new ones, and was therefore dutiable as a lease subject to the limitation of duty in section 77 (5) of the Stamp Act 1891. If the deed was not a lease, it was dutiable under the heading 'bond, covenant, or instrument of any kind whatsoever' in Schedule 1 to the Act, not being rent reserved by a lease or tack, and section 77 (5) was inapplicable. Alternatively, section 77 (5) limited the duty to that which would have been chargeable, had the deed been a lease. The deed was adjudicated to ad valorem lease duty on the amount of the increase in the average rents:

£2,600	..	..	..	..	..	624	0
Deed duty	..	..	..	..	..		10
						£3,096	10

Held: the variation deed was not a lease, but operated as an agreement for the increase of the rents, leaving the original leases subsisting; the deed was dutiable as bond, covenant, with the limitation in section 77 (5); the adjudicated amount was correct.

Lupton v. Cadogan Gardens Development Ltd

Carlton Tower Ltd v. Moore

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division) – July 14th, 1970

(Before Mr Justice GOFF)

Income tax – Writing-down allowances – Machinery and plant – Hotel – Service installations – Whether lessor or lessee entitled to allowances – Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1878, section 12 – Income Tax Act 1918, Cases I and II of Schedule D, Rule 6 (2) – Finance Act 1940, section 22 – Income Tax Act 1945, section 20 – Income Tax Act 1952, sections 298, 299.

By two leases certain machinery and plant was let with and forming part of a hotel and restaurant for 90 years from September 29th, 1960. The lessee covenanted to maintain in good repair all parts of the demised premises and the service installations and fixtures inside and out; and by clause 2 (f) to replace all outside service installations becoming worn-out or unfit for use. It was conceded for the purpose of these cases that the items in question were machinery or plant, and that it was highly probable that clause 2 (f) would take effect, and possibly more than once, during the lease.

The Special Commissioners granted the capital allowances in respect of the installations to the lessor, Cadogan Gardens Development Ltd, and refused them to the lessee, Carlton Tower Ltd.

Held: the Special Commissioners had failed to give proper effect to clause 2 (f); and that the lessee was entitled to the allowances.

FINANCE AND COMMERCE

A Computer Tale from Scottish and Newcastle Breweries

FIRST things should come first, and in a company's accounts the first thing so far as order is concerned is the profit and loss account; at least it is in this column's opinion. But Scottish & Newcastle Breweries' order is parent balance sheet – two-sided and gross – group balance sheet on the same basis, and then, finally, profit and loss account.

And yet one of the prime points in the Scottish & Newcastle accounts, it has to be admitted, is a balance sheet point: the £4 million rise in debtors and payments in advance to £15.31 million in the parent balance sheet and to £16.26 million in the group. The explanation given by the new chairman, Mr P. E. G. Balfour, in his annual review will wring sympathy from people who have suffered in the same way, understanding from those who fear they may in future suffer in the same way and glee from the members of the 'I hate computers' brigade – because the explanation is that Scottish & Newcastle underestimated the problems involved in a major change to computer accounting.

But let Mr Balfour tell the story. At the beginning of the financial year a third generation computer was brought into service and a computer-based system of invoicing and billing customers was introduced.

Many weeks behind

'With hindsight', Mr Balfour says, 'it is clear that we underestimated the magnitude of the problems which such a step involved and were further handicapped by a series of failures in the equipment itself.' The result was that at one time the rendering of customers' statements was 'many weeks' behind normal dates, although by the end of the financial year the position had returned to normal.

The delays slowed down cash collections and it is estimated that at the date of the accounts collections were two weeks behind what the company considers desirable. All this, coupled with higher prices and volume of sales, accounts for the £4 million rise in debtors. Mr Balfour pays tribute to customers who put up with much inconvenience over a long period, to 'the many who paid substantial sums on account during the period when no statements or invoices were prepared' and to members of the company's staff who 'produced alternative sources of management information when none was available from the computer'.

The situation is now stated to be 'much improved' and the chairman says 'We are confident that in due course we shall get full value from this extremely expensive piece of equipment.' Nevertheless, during the past year the computer failure deprived the group of cash flow that could have been turned to profitable use (this is reflected in the fall in income from short-term deposits) and involved the group in 'much additional cost in the form of consultants' fees and other expenditure that might otherwise have been avoided.'

Organic growth

The Scottish & Newcastle group has found it possible to sustain a major growth in sales without a corresponding increase in the size of the licensed estate, other than hotels, although there has been considerable investment in improving premises. Growth has been based on a high degree of centralized control.

The policy is that Scottish beers should be brewed in Scotland and Newcastle beers in Newcastle, and in these conditions the group's interests are considered to be best served by organic growth rather than by merger or acquisition within the industry. Production and distribution, however, must keep pace with sales expansion and it is planned to increase the output of the group's Edinburgh breweries by 50 per cent by 1975, with provision for further expansion. Output capacity at the Tyne brewery will be increased by the end of this year.

Additions to Edinburgh and Newcastle kegging plants have already been made and the extent of the group's operations is indicated by the completion of new depots at Acton (London), Chorley (Lancashire) and at Leicester. The group is also a partner in Harp Lager whose brewery is next to Scottish & Newcastle's Holyrood Ale Brewery.

Expansion in the hotel field has furthered trade in new areas and a major hotel construction and additions programme, including new hotels in Edinburgh, Birmingham, Liverpool, Luton and London, is in hand to qualify for the hotel incentive scheme which ends in May 1973.

Earnings rise

In the group balance sheet, within the £567,000 net increase in fixed assets, licensed properties have marginally diminished whilst fittings and furnishings have increased by £750,000. This represents, the chairman says, the continuing policy of selling off unremunerative premises and financing expansion in the hotel field by sale and lease-back arrangements.

During the year, five new hotels and nine new public houses were completed, as were major improvements and extensions to a further seven hotels and a large number of pubs.

As well as benefiting from a substantial increase in sales volume, the past year benefited from price increases granted at the end of 1969. Particularly satisfactory to the board is the increase of 16.9 per cent in profits after tax and minority interests to reach £1,155,000, which means a rise from 2s 9.5d to 3s 3.8d in earnings per share. The dividend – raised from 10 $\frac{2}{3}$ per cent to 12 per cent – is covered 1.38 times.

Basically, the measures taken over five years to improve the use of capital are at last beginning to show results. 'This', the chairman says, 'is a trend which we hope to perpetuate in the future.'

Changes in Accounting Treatment

ATENTION of shareholders in United Dominions Trust is drawn by the chairman, Mr Alexander Ross, to two changes in accounting treatment in the accounts to June 30th which were issued with customary UDT promptitude on August 12th. The first change is that the method of computing income in respect of leasing transactions has been altered to reflect more accurately the income accruing from the business, and the second is the revision in accounting treatment of income arising from certain trade investments.

The latter alteration naturally follows the latest recommendation of the English Institute and involves taking into account the UDT proportion of aggregate earnings of the companies concerned both before and after tax, instead of the amount of dividend received. Mr Ross makes the point that 'it is nevertheless only dividends which will be regarded as available for distribution by the group'.

The leasing treatment change means that the amount brought into account each period is proportionate to the reducing balance of rentals and any investment grant outstanding. Restating 1969 amounts on the new basis results in an increase of £255,000 in pre-tax profit for that year, with an additional charge of £115,000 for tax equalization. There is also an addition to opening of revenue reserves of £24,000 net after tax in respect of similar adjustments for financial years beginning before July 1st, 1968.

Fire Loss

ANOTE to the accounts of W. Moore & Osborne (Holdings), hosiery and knitwear producers and distributors, records that after the date of the accounts the company was notified that one of its customers had suffered a severe fire loss. A meeting of the creditors has been held, the note states, from which it is clear that the customer's financial position is serious and 'in consequence it is considered prudent to reserve as doubtful the full amount of the debt, pending clarification of the position'.

The total amount owing at March 31st, 1970, was £14,530 but, after allowing for purchase tax which it is anticipated would be refundable should the debt prove irrecoverable, the net loss to the company will be £12,588.

After the end of the financial year but prior to the fire, further sales were made to the debtor which may necessitate a write-off of an additional £3,567 (after allowing for refundable purchase tax) during the current financial year.

The figures may seem small but they look uncomfortably large against the year's group profit of £2,936, compared with £13,517 in 1968-69. The profit, besides having to stand the £12,588 specific doubtful debt provision, also has to carry a penultimate £2,050 write-off of deferred revenue expenditure. The net result is that a debit of £2,044 is carried forward against the credit of £9,658 brought in.

Use of Graphs

BY now most readers of these notes will have appreciated that the writer takes exception to unnecessary columnar graphs in company accounts, particularly graphs which do nothing that plainly presented figures cannot do just as well.

Let it be said that this reference is to 'unnecessary' graphs and charts. Some information can better be presented and explained by a graph or chart, thus simplifying the complications of company reporting. Charts and graphs have their place in company accounts, but not necessarily for their own sake – those which merely repeat what is obvious are superfluous.

In the Northern Developments (Holdings) report for the year to last March there is a page containing the following figures:

Year	Pre-tax profit £	Increase on previous year £
1966	142,659
1967	259,735	117,076
1968	427,390	167,655
1969	621,727	194,337
1970	1,020,275	398,548
1971	Substantially higher profits forecast

These figures, which seem to be perfectly clear on their own, are printed under a 'Profit growth chart 1966-1971' which consists of black columns representing the profits of 1966 through to 1970 and then – and this is the big breakthrough – a light blue, shaded column soaring out of the top of the page with printed vertically up the column 'Forecast of very substantial increase in profits'.

There is presumably a difference of a kind between 'Substantially higher profits forecast' and 'Forecast of very substantial increase in profits'. A very substantial increase, of course, could lead to substantially higher profits.

This column's information is that £1,500,000 is a conservative estimate of this year's profits.

On the Broads

HIRING out boats on the Norfolk Broads is not apparently the money spinning business it is cracked up to be. The Caister Group, basically a holiday camp company, went into the Broads boat hiring business very gingerly by buying a small yard which went well. Caister then bought the premier yard on the Broads – Herbert Woods of Potter Heigham. This was another success.

Subsequently, as Mr T. A. Watson, Caister's chairman, recounts in his statement with the latest accounts, 'we bought Jenners of Thorpe, which has so far turned out disappointingly'. This large yard in the southern area of the Broads has failed to generate enough business to justify the capital charges and has proved a considerable drain on resources.

The position is being tackled by reducing the number of yards and boats and retaining only those capable of profits. Boats no longer popular or unduly expensive to maintain are being 'ruthlessly culled'. No appreciable loss is anticipated as the boats are well written down and receipts from sales may exceed their book value.

Although Mr Watson does not mention the point, it would not be at all surprising if one of the contributory causes for the disappointment was the purchase from a Wroxham yard of a fleet of relatively old cruisers which had a faithful hiring following out of Wroxham – but not out of Thorpe when they were transferred there.

5 DEPRECIATION OF FIXED ASSETS AND LEASING CHARGES

Depreciation has been calculated on cost, less grants where applicable, using the following methods:—
Properties. Freehold industrial buildings—straight line, 2% per annum.
 Other freehold properties and certain leaseholds treated as freehold—not depreciated.
 Leasehold properties—straight line over the unexpired terms of the leases.
Fittings and Furnishings in Licensed Properties. The reducing balance method is in force except in the case of certain hotels and recently purchased properties, which are depreciated on a straight line basis. In both cases the charge is based on anticipated useful life.
Plant and Vehicles. Straight line—over anticipated useful life.

Leasing charges in respect of kegs, plant and vehicles amounted to £580,000 (1969: £179,000).

6 CAPITAL COMMITMENTS AND AUTHORISED EXPENDITURE

At 30th April 1970 capital expenditure authorised by the Directors but not provided for at that date was estimated as follows:—

	Principal Company £	Group £
Commitments in respect of outstanding contracts and loans to customers	4,532,000	4,574,000
Projects authorised for which no contracts have been placed	3,604,000	3,616,000
	£3,893,000	£4,232,000

It is anticipated that these items will attract grants amounting to £249,000 (1969: £216,000).

7 CONTINGENT LIABILITIES

At 30th April 1970 there were contingent liabilities in respect of:—
 (a) Uncalled capital of subsidiaries amounting to £79,000 (1969: £79,000).
 (b) The guarantee of loans advanced by third parties up to a maximum of £1,157,000 (1969: £1,017,000).
 (c) Other guarantees amounting to £107,000 (1969: £77,000).

10 STOCKS

Stocks manufactured or in process of manufacture by Group Companies have been valued at cost, which comprises materials, duty at the rates in force at 30th April 1970, and, where appropriate, a fair proportion of labour and working expenses.
 Raw materials, operating and other supplies have been valued at the lower of cost or realisable value.
 Casks (other than whisky casks which are dealt with as plant), kegs, casks, and sundry items of ancillary equipment are included at written down values based on their anticipated useful life.

11 GROUP TURNOVER

The turnover of the Group, as charged to external customers in the year to 30th April 1970 was £134,323,000 (1969: £117,194,000).

12 TAXATION

(a) Corporation Tax on the profit of the year has been provided at 45%.
 (b) Taxation overprovided of £917,000 is shown in General Reserve (Note 1). Of this amount, £844,000 arose from negotiations with the Inland Revenue in connection with the change made some years ago in the tax treatment of certain assets (mainly furniture and fittings in licensed properties acquired from subsidiaries). These assets prior to the change were dealt with on a renewals basis: thereafter they have been dealt with on a capital allowances basis.
 (c) No Company in the Group is a Close Company as defined for the purposes of the Finance Acts.

13 GROUP NET PROFIT

The proportion of the Group Net Profit attributable to the Principal Company was £7,503,000 (1969: £6,323,000).

CITY NOTES

THEORETICALLY, at least, the silly season is over and the City's markets should be reflecting a return to work and full-time consideration of all things financial, economic, industrial and commercial. It remains to be seen whether or not that consideration brings operators in the City's markets to any firm conclusion about what is going to happen next.

That, after all, is what any market is all about. A market's prices reflect views on future trends, future shortages, future supplies, future demand or future lack of it.

But does consideration of the industrial scene lead to a convincing view that there is going to be an early strong demand, for example, for industrial equities? Does consideration suggest demand for fixed interest stocks on the basis of expectation of lower interest rates?

It is difficult to see either view being held this autumn, any more than either was held during the late summer. Firm views cannot be expected to be taken until the Government has given some indication by action of how it intends to deal with the current condition of rampant inflation combined with industrial stagnation.

Given some outline of government policy and some evidence of government intent on that subject and the City's markets may begin to move. Without outline or evidence the silly season may last a while longer yet.

FIGURES from the unit trusts are now providing an uncomfortable reminder to managers – if any reminder is at all necessary – that the intake of money has been poor now for over a year. It was mid-1969 when the boom period finally ended.

The period of more than a year since then has provided further evidence that managers cannot sell units when the market is wrong – at least units cannot be sold substantially. A net intake of £7 million or so in a month may look a reasonable figure but it is not so when it is spread over more than 200 authorized trusts.

* * * *

WITH only 26 per cent of the share issue taken up, the Robert Stigwood Group share offer proved one of the more spectacular flops that the City has seen. Of 2,100,000 shares offered at 7s 6d only 540,050 were taken up.

The issue was given just about the coolest reception of any equity offer for very many years. It has been suggested that it flopped because the City does not understand modern showbusiness. Perhaps the City understands it only too well.

PREPARING FOR DECIMALS

An Increasing Awareness

RESearch conducted earlier this year on behalf of the Decimal Currency Board indicates that 70 per cent of adults were aware that Britain would change over to decimal currency in 1971, compared with less than 40 per cent a year earlier. Thirty-four per cent of adults correctly named February 1971 as the month of change-over, compared with less than 20 per cent previously.

Up to three-quarters of all transactions are likely to be conducted in decimals within a week after D-Day. The evidence of a 'massive immediate swing to decimal working' supports the Board's forecast made in 1968 that the change-over period would last at most eighteen months, but that the bulk of the operation would be over in a much shorter time.

It is acknowledged that not every business will be able to change immediately, and it would be unwise to plan for a D-Day changeover regardless of cost and inconvenience. It is better to go decimal after D-Day and do it well than to switch immediately and make serious mistakes.

Those responsible for the retail price of goods and services will be expected to use the official shoppers' table when repricing. But in staff training too much emphasis need not be given to mental conversion between £sd and £p. It is better to concentrate on practical change-giving and to rely on the printed conversion tables.

The sixpence will remain legal tender for at least two years after D-Day, but may not be freely available for more than a short period. How freely the coin circulates depends on the willingness of retailers and cash handlers who have changed to decimal trading to use it as $2\frac{1}{2}p$ in change-giving. The general view seems to be that they will set the coins aside with threepenny bits and pennies, and pay them into the bank.

Minimum orders of £60 for each denomination of the decimal bronze coins are already being accepted by the banks.

Use and Misuse of Conversion Tables

THE Decimal Currency Board has also given a warning of the use and misuse of conversion tables. The importance of such tables during the change-over period should not be exaggerated.

No one should try to construct his own table or to calculate his own roundings. Using the official shoppers' table is easy and the Board expects the results to be readily understood by everybody. The public will be very price-conscious during the changeover, and official publicity will encourage the general application of the shoppers' table to retail prices. If it is not used, any suspicion of unjustified price increases may lead to a permanent loss of goodwill.

One thing the table does not exist for is the exchange of coins. Although the table shows 3p as the corresponding amount for 7d, it does not mean that a shopkeeper should be expected to take 7d for an article priced at 3p, or that he can give 7d instead of 3p change. Application of a conversion table is a once-for-all operation. Once prices in the shop have been converted, the table has no further part to play in selling. From then on everything is done decimally – items bought are added to a decimal total and what the customer has to pay is that decimal amount. The 'corresponding amount' in £sd of the individual items or of the total is irrelevant.

No one should be expected to learn a part or the whole of a conversion table. Office staff who have to make a lot of conversions will make fewer mistakes if they refer to the relevant table than if they convert mentally. In retailing, the table is used once only to convert prices, so that counter staff simply do not need to memorize it.

Display versions of the shoppers' table, size 30×20 ins, are available from HMSO bookshops, price 1s.

Fun with Figures

MR ALBERT BATTERSBY, the author of 'Mathematics in Management', has been given full freedom to present his personal view of the advantages of decimal currency. It is, as Mr Battersby admits, no small matter to try to change the way in which fifty million people think, but in this booklet (issued by Twinlock as the third publication in their 'Planning for Decimalisation' series) he accepts the assignment with zest and conspicuous good humour. Whether his coined abbreviation 'nuppence' (for new pence) is likely to find general favour is perhaps a matter of personal prejudice.

The conventional teaching of elementary arithmetic has dealt rather sketchily with the value of 'zero' to establish the position of a digit, and the use of position to show orders of magnitude. These simple concepts are, of course, fundamental to a decimal coinage system, where multiplication or division by powers of 10 involves shifting the decimal point the requisite number of places to right or left. Once they are grasped, reckoning in decimals becomes simplicity itself – a fact demonstrated by the ease with which British servicemen in the Middle East adapted themselves to the Egyptian pound with its subdivision into 100 piastres.

The suggested way 'to make friends with the new system' is to doodle around with additions and subtractions, from 'nuppence' to pounds and back again. In the author's words: 'If you play around like this, you will get confidence in your own ability to move around in the new environment, just like a person who gains confidence in the water by splashing around in the shallow end'. The text includes various examples, to which anyone who succeeds in giving the correct snap answers may have a turn at writing this column.

Unit Trusts in Decimals

A committee set up by the Association of Unit Trust Managers to study problems associated with the change-over to decimal currency attached particular importance to the clarity of expression of unit prices, and the ease of reproducing them in newspapers.

Because the majority of unit trust prices are below a pound, it was considered that the public will tend to focus on the new penny as a unit on its own for prices in this range. Furthermore, to conform with the principle of decimalization it was decided to base unit prices on tenths of a new penny rather than on other fractions. For these reasons, unit trust prices should be expressed in pence and decimal parts of a new penny. Thus, for example, a unit trust price of $42\frac{1}{10}$ pence would be expressed as 42.1p. Prices over £1 would still be expressed in pence, e.g., 142.1p. Vulgar fractions will not be used in the quotation of unit trust prices.

Prices and distributions will continue to be calculated in accordance with the principles which have previously been followed.

'Granny Gets the Point'

IT may be anticipated that the change to decimal currency – and possibly, in due course, to metric units – will present more problems to the elderly who have reckoned throughout their lives in the present Imperial units than to schoolchildren who have been grounded in the new system. The latest issue of old-age-pension booklets includes the amount payable in decimal equivalents, and unfortunately succeeded in confusing at least one senior citizen who read £3.10 as '£3 10s' rather than as the decimal expression of £3 2s.

This particular error is hardly surprising, and with the needs of the elderly particularly in mind the Decimal Currency Board has sponsored a film under the title of 'Granny Gets the Point'. Intended for general public audiences rather than for staff training, the film (featuring Doris Hare in the title role) presents the many problems which are likely to confront the average family. The 'expert' is, of course, young Peter who has learned it all at school; evidently grandmothers can now be taught other things besides sucking eggs.

'Granny Gets the Point' (16 mm, Catalogue No. UK2676) will be available early in September on free loan from the Central Film Library, Bromyard Avenue, Acton, London W3. It is made in colour and runs for 27 minutes.

What Price Decimals?

WHAT is the purpose of a price ticket? This question is considered in the second of a series of articles issued by the Decimal Currency Board, entitled 'Dual Pricing'.

Where a price ticket shows both decimal and £sd prices, during the change-over period, it will be necessary to make it clear which is the offer price and which the guidance price. Since not all £sd amounts convert exactly to decimal currency, allowing the customer to choose which price to pay would complicate both training and cash control, and would mean that the trader risks losing the benefit of the rounding-up and down which is a feature of the official conversion tables.

The purpose of dual pricing for the public is to indicate the corresponding price in the other currency, and the public will expect a dual price ticket normally to conform to the shoppers' table.

The Decimal Currency Board has also been advised that no offence is committed under section 11 of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 by the display on a price ticket of £sd and decimal amounts, provided that the conversion is made in accordance with the shoppers' table.

Mixed Money

DURING the change-over period after D-Day, £sd and £p coins will both circulate as legal tender. Businesses which have converted their own records to decimal may expect to receive £sd coins (either alone or in combination with £p) and vice versa. Notwithstanding the optimistic official statement that 'all those who handle cash as part of their job, including every shop assistant in the country, should know by D-Day how to deal with mixed amounts of £sd and £p coins' the correct tender in one currency (or in mixed £sd and £p) for a price expressed in the other is likely to create problems, particularly in retail trade.

Apart from the problematical life of the sixpence as equivalent to $2\frac{1}{2}$ p, all silver coins have an exact decimal equivalent. Thus if a prospective customer having only the Filming on the set of 'Granny Gets the Point'. The picture shows the director, Jeff Inman, sitting at the table; beside him stand Peter (played by Chris Ellis), Peter's father (Glyn Houston) and Granny (Doris Hare) sitting on the settee. The film was produced by Ray Elton and written by Michael Ingrams.

'wrong' currency tenders coins totalling to the next multiple of 1s or 5p above the price, he can be given the correct change whether the vendor is working in £sd or £p, and without reference to conversion tables.

Where, however, the customer is unable to make up an exact number of shillings, many suppliers are expected to take the view that their goodwill is worth more than a fraction of a penny.

Letters

The Future of the Profession

SIR, - In one respect I have personally gained from the failure of the integration scheme - my receipts from wagers on the outcome have been quite substantial!

My last nine years have been spent in public practice, and the previous twelve years as an employee of practitioners. Of those twelve years, nine were spent in the offices of chartered accountants. Anyone with similar experience should really have known the outcome of the voting. (I only slightly wavered when the 'conditional' Scottish vote was known).

For those against the scheme the day was won because of two factors, i.e., a series of myths remained unscathed, and a series of facts defied contradiction.

The myths were (and still are) as follows:

- (1) 'A chartered student has the hardest path to qualification, i.e., conditions for work and study'. Nonsense. Take a look at students in industry and commerce. Cogs in a big machine, working very hard - often on overtime. Little time off. No easy-going atmosphere of a professional office with generous study leave. (I saw these conditions when out on large-scale company audits.)
- (2) 'Chartered examinations are harder'. Some people still think the earth is flat. I used to practice with chartered 'telephones' and found them very little different from those of the Association.
- (3) 'The very designation "chartered" represents quality, efficiency, diplomacy, maturity, stability, knowledge, character, etc.' This is like stating that all students are troublemakers, all Roman Catholics good, all Germans aggressive, etc.
- (4) 'Practising chartered accountants are the most respected members of the profession, the élite in fact'. Read the papers lately?

However, certain facts also won the day and should be remembered:

- (1) 'Professional practice training has depth, breadth, and variety unequalled.' This cannot be denied. Commercial or local government training has greater depth in specialized spheres, but has not the vast overall coverage available in practitioners' offices.

- (2) 'Practising accountants are independent and, therefore, their position more unique.' The point here is that they usually have no direct interests in the businesses on which they advise, and should not be susceptible to pressures that could defeat sound judgement. Compare this with the lot of the commercial accountant.
- (3) 'First loyalties of the practitioner are to the image of the public accountant and the prestige and high standard of professional etiquette that he hopes the general public believe in.' There are always exceptions, but I think the average practitioner values his image far more than the prospects of prosperity from his practice.
- (4) 'The practitioner is in a better position to pass on high standards of ability and professional behaviour to students.' This should be so, although the lot of students in practitioners' offices still leaves much to be desired.

There is no doubt in my mind that chartered accountants in public practice and the older generation rather than the younger ones, defeated the integration scheme. To them it would have been like mixing chalk with cheese, and therefore not on.

Those of us who are not chartered, but are nevertheless practice-trained, are probably the most anxious to know the answer to the one remaining question - where do we go from here?

Yours faithfully,

Lewes, Sussex.

JOHN W. ADDISON, F.A.C.C.A.

SIR, - The failure of the scheme for the integration of the accountancy profession will be a disappointment to many who looked forward to its unification on progressive lines. Those who have given so much time and energy to the promotion of this scheme must feel a sense of frustration. Nevertheless I am glad that the Council of the English Institute had the courage and vision to promote a scheme for development of the profession which, if adopted, would have laid a sound foundation for the future, and I hope that they will not be discouraged by the final response of the members. After all, as the scientist is well aware, we learn more from our failures than our successes.

I hope that the Council will still feel encouraged to advocate the adoption of those parts of the scheme which can be embodied in the Institute's own charter and regulations; particularly those relating to more unrestricted training and a sound basis of education which represented such a marked advance on the system at present in force.

Yours faithfully,

ARNOLD FRYER,

F.C.A., F.A.C.C.A., A.C.W.A.

Swansea.

Overseas Appointments

SIR, - Each week in your excellent journal I read through the advertisements for overseas professional appointments and wonder how many more young accountants will be drawn out of England, blinded by the temptations of 'glorious climate, excellent sporting and social facilities, etc.', only to find themselves a few months later in a country of employment with which they are not satisfied but to which they are irrevocably bound by contract.

It is a sad fact that overseas working and living conditions, although ideal for some, do not appeal to all temperaments. The prospective employer can gauge his recruits from qualifications and experience, but the employee has no real means of finding out about his employer and the country which he has chosen (apart from glowing tourist brochures and enthusiastic agencies). However, to return prematurely to England under the vast majority of contracts involves heavy expenditure, including repayment of all air fares and the sacrifice of all leave entitlement.

Could not the professional bodies recommend their overseas members to offer contracts with a break clause after, say, nine months? On this date the employee decides either to complete his contract or to return to the UK. If he chooses the latter option his air fares and leave entitlements should be pro rata over the total contract.

Two years is a long time for a young accountant, in the first stages of career development, to regret a decision inevitably made without access to all the facts.

As I am myself serving an overseas contract I sign myself simply:

Yours faithfully,
EXPATRIATE ACCOUNTANT.

Share Incentive Schemes

SIR, - A company (a family business of 20 years' standing), employs approximately 60 executives and workpeople. It operates a simple weekly wage bonus scheme based on a scale varied to production achieved, for the managers/foremen and workpeople.

This has certainly levelled off the production output to a better regular weekly figure and, being accumulated to a monthly 'pay-out', is giving the workpeople £8 to £10 per month extra, and double this amount for managers and foremen.

Rates of pay are considerably over union minima. The company does not recognize itself as a union shop, although many of the employees are in unions.

The management is aware that an output bonus scheme can induce waste and poor work, thereby losing customers. The raw material content in the trade is high, from 50 to 60 per cent of the selling price, and the nature of the material - chiefly timber - is in a form where waste (viz., using wrong thicknesses, careless conversion, cross-cutting), can be considerable unless each man employed is sensitively geared up to avoid it.

It is felt that a form of voluntary share incentive scheme for all employees, as an addition to the production bonus scheme, may offer the business the final 'advancement of mutual efficiency'.

The company carries an overdraft of approximately £20,000 and with expanding business this is unlikely ever to be effectively reduced without increased capital being introduced into the business. The proprietors do not intend to take this sort of action.

The management would be interested to learn of any existing schemes for this size of business. Doubtless a considerable number of employees would welcome a stake in the business and the further profitability of the company would be influenced by this incentive. It is envisaged that the stake would be from a small weekly or monthly investment from the individual net wages and bonus, carrying a guaranteed rate of 'dividend' of at least 10 per cent plus an annual 'bonus dividend' to be paid after ordinary shareholders' dividend from the improved results it is to be hoped would ensue. The capital staked and the guaranteed dividend would, over a period, replace the overdraft charge and costs.

The family proprietors are naturally anxious that the employees' stake should not carry proprietorship control, nor the capital appreciation naturally springing from the usage of the business assets, energy and goodwill.

Do any readers know of some form of deferred shareholding possible for employees to produce these restricted advantages?

Yours faithfully,
JAWSP.

Figures and Charts

SIR, - In the 'Finance and Commerce' section of your issue of August 13th, the note headed 'Figures and Charts' contains implied criticism of the additional graphical presentation in the annual report of the Metal Box Co and entirely misses the main issue.

In my view, the prime objective of any accountant presenting information should be to aim for maximum understanding of the facts presented and he must choose the best presentation to achieve that objective. Whilst the 'simple mind' of the column may understand presentation in figures, a large percentage of shareholders would not as they have not been trained to understand figures.

Yours faithfully,
Woking, Surrey. V. J. A. UNDERHILL, A.A.C.C.A.

[Our City Editor writes: The point is taken. But there are times when charts and graphs in an attempt to explain become more complicated than the plain figures they are intended to illustrate. The need is for balance and proportion. Metal Box's charts were said to be 'well done', which at least suggests that the 'simple mind' knows a good chart when it sees one.]

Goodwill: Ladies' Hairdresser

SIR, - I have to establish the value of goodwill and of the unexpired lease at Domesday. The lease has recently been sold and the goodwill lost. The inspector is calling for tax on the capital gain arising on the lease, and I am attempting to establish a capital loss in relation to the goodwill.

Advertisements in the trade paper indicate prices of 20-25 weeks' turnover for businesses with leases of 4-9 years unexpired, but no division is suggested. Profits are rarely mentioned though normally vital in calculations at the time of purchase.

Readers' views on the establishment of values at Domesday and sale would be appreciated.

Yours faithfully,
CURLER.

Student Roundabout

LONDON SOCIETY'S OXFORD COURSE

THERE have been more than 200 applicants for places at the Oxford Course of The Chartered Accountant Students' Society of London, due to be held at Balliol and Trinity Colleges from September 17th to 20th. A limited number of places are still available and members wishing to take advantage of these should write immediately to the Society's secretary, 43 London Wall, London EC2.

'Theory and practice of management accounting' will be the theme of the course which is designed for Final students. The lecture programme will deal with such matters as the functions of management and the types of information required, preparation of budgets, standard costing, break-even analysis, and investment appraisal. Group discussions will concentrate on the solution of particular problems, most of which will be examination questions.

The course will be an exacting one, but there will still be time for the traditional punt race on Saturday and other free periods in which to obtain some brief relaxation. The fee for the course is £15 15s which includes travel to and from Oxford.

TALKS ON AUDITING AND REVENUE PROCEDURES

THE Chartered Accountant Students' Society of London is to hold a series of lectures for its members working in the West End during September and October.

The first of these lectures takes place on September 22nd on 'Auditing' and the speaker will be Mr V. S.

Hockley, B.COM., C.A., F.A.C.C.A., who will cover among other matters the purposes of the audit, verification procedures for stock and debtors, and the final report and qualifications.

'Revenue procedures' will be the title of the second lecture to be held on October 6th, when Mr F. Dobby, a Chief Inspector of Taxes, will deal with such aspects as the rights of taxpayers and the Revenue relating to appeals, and liability of individuals and companies concerning returns of income and capital gains.

Both lectures will commence at 4.30 p.m., admission to which will be free. The first will be held in the Kent Room, Caxton Hall, London SW1, and the second will take place at the offices of The British Computer Society, 29 Portland Place, London W1.

SUMMER BALL

THE CASS of London held their first Summer Ball for a number of years at Grosvenor House on August 7th. Despite an evening of thunderstorms and torrential rain the occasion went with a swing – over 300 were present – and it was after 3.30 the following morning before the revellers departed.

Dancing was to Sidney Lipton's Band alternating with a steel band in the ballroom, and to a discothèque nearby. The President of the Society, Mr G. R. Appleyard, F.C.A., together with his wife were very welcome guests – despite their considerable success at the tombola! – and also proved nimble exponents of the quickstep.

The Society was very pleased to see one City firm, Arthur Young & Co, who brought a party of 60.

The 1971 ball will be held in June.

HALF-DAY COURSE AT EXETER

A HALF-DAY course on 'Company law' is to be held by the Exeter and District Chartered Accountant Students' Society on Wednesday, December 9th at 2.45 p.m., at the Rougemont Hotel, Queen Street, Exeter.

The speaker will be Mr A. J. Whiteside, of the Accountancy Tuition Centre, London, who will deal in particular with the requirements, procedure and conduct of meetings of shareholders including extraordinary and annual general meetings. During his talk, Mr Whiteside proposes to conduct a 'mock annual general meeting'. Refreshments will be provided at the end of the course.

Applications to attend should be made as soon as possible to the course organizer, Mr A. J. Bruce, c/o Francis S. Clark & Co, 31 St David's Hill, Exeter.

Brewery Visit Postponed

Due to a rebuilding programme and other factors, the visit by Exeter students to the Starkey Knight & Ford brewery at Tiverton, which had been arranged to take place later this month, has had to be postponed. It is hoped to rearrange the visit in the near future.

CAR TREASURE HUNT

THE Birmingham Chartered Accountant Students' Society is to hold a car treasure hunt on September 27th throughout Worcestershire and Herefordshire. There will be a cash prize for the winner.

The entrance fee is a modest £1 and members owning 'any type of car' are eligible to take part. Those interested should write to Martin Olliver, c/o The Library, Fountain Court, Steelhouse Lane, Birmingham 4.

TAVERNERS' MEETING

AN interesting talk was given by Mr P. J. Rutteman, B.SC.(ECON.), A.C.A., of Arthur Young McClelland Moores & Co, of London, the guest speaker at a meeting this week of the 'Taverners'.

Mr Rutteman made some enlightening comments on the American social scene and referred to the 'mysteries' of accounting in the United States. As usual, the meeting was held in the Dive Bar of The Green Man, Bucklersbury, London EC4.

Professor Roy Sidebotham

It is with regret that we record the sudden death on Wednesday of last week at the age of 43 of Professor Roy Sidebotham, B.A.(COM), F.C.A.(N.Z.), F.A.C.C.A., A.I.M.T.A., A.C.I.S., J.DIP.M.A., who had held the Chair of Accountancy at Victoria University, Wellington, since 1961.

Professor Sidebotham took a very active interest in local government in which he started his career at the age of 26 with Hyde Borough Council in 1953. He subsequently served as an officer with a number of local authorities before returning in 1955 to Manchester University (where he had taken his degree) to become lecturer in Accounting and Local Government Finance.

In 1961, he was appointed the first holder of the Chair of Accountancy at Victoria University, Wellington, and at the time of his death he was chairman of the National Public Sector Accounts Committee of the New Zealand Society of Accountants.

In 1968 Professor Sidebotham became Senior Visiting Research Fellow at the Institute of Local Government Studies, Birmingham University, and in the following year he held a Carnegie Fellowship to observe the organization of business schools and the teaching of local government at universities in the United States.

In the final examinations of both The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants and The Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants he won First Place and Prize and was also awarded The Arthur Collins Memorial Gold Medal of the latter Institute.

LONDON AND DISTRICT SOCIETY OF CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS

Programme for 1970-71

A full programme of courses, conferences, luncheons and evening meetings arranged by the London and District Society of Chartered Accountants for its 1970-71 session is set out in a de luxe foolscap 'desk diary' in contrast to the pocket size booklet of previous years. No member can now say that he 'overlooked' a meeting or conference.

'Problems of decimalization in the smaller business' is the title of the first half-day course - indeed the first of the session - and is to be held at the Great Western Royal Hotel, Paddington, London W2 on September 30th, commencing at 2.15 p.m. with an introductory address by Mr Roger Bedforth. A wide range of subjects is covered by twelve other non-residential courses, including 'Financial incentives for top management', 'Tax havens, or the conduct of personal and business activity in territories with a low effective rate of tax on the income and gains arising from the activity', 'Basic estate duty', and 'Investigations and valuations of businesses'. A joint meeting has been arranged with the Holborn Law Society on 'Tax - marriage, separation and divorce', to take place on October 17th, at Chartered Accountants' Hall, Moorgate Place, London EC2.

These are all of one day's duration, and there will be another half-day course at the Great Western Royal Hotel on October 13th, when Mr Paul Rutteman, A.C.A., is to be the main speaker on 'Statistical sampling'.

Six residential courses lasting two days each will be held at either the Grand Hotel, Eastbourne, or Hotel

Metropole, Brighton. The first will be at Eastbourne from November 12th-14th under the chairmanship of Mr E. E. Ray, B.COM., F.C.A. Later in the month (November 26th-28th) the 1970 Management Conference will be chaired by Mr S. R. Harding, F.C.A., a member of the Institute's Council, at Brighton.

All six evening meetings of the Society will take place at Chartered Accountants' Hall and start on October 8th with Mr Ray speaking on 'The Finance Act 1970'. Subjects to be discussed at other meetings include 'Transfer of assets abroad', 'Training and nine-month courses', and 'Planning for the entertainer'. Of particular interest will be the meeting attended by one of HM Inspectors of Taxes on January 28th, when the procedure will be as in previous sessions: addresses by a chartered accountant and the Inspector, and then questions from the audience. The subject will be announced in due course.

Luncheon meetings will be held, as in the past, at the Connaught Rooms; Mr Charles H. Villiers, M.C., managing director of the Industrial Reorganization Corporation, will address the first on October 22nd, and Mrs Margaret Thatcher, M.P., Secretary of State for Education, Mr Paul Chambers, K.B.E., C.B., C.I.E., and the Hon. David Montague will speak at the others.

To mark the one-hundredth anniversary of the formation of the Institute of Accountants in London in November 1870, there will be a centenary dance at Grosvenor House, Park Lane, London W1, on March 19th.

The text of this well-known and authoritative work has been reviewed and considerably extended to meet the changes in auditing philosophy and company law over the period since the last edition was published, without destroying the basic views on the subject which the original author held in so individual a way.

The requirements of the Companies Acts of 1948 and 1967 are fully discussed, and the need to pay particular attention to points of difficulty and controversy has not been ignored. Legal decisions are discussed and more fully reported than is usual in such works, and recent developments such as statistical sampling techniques, internal control questionnaires, flow-charting, etc., are reviewed. A new chapter has been added on auditors' working papers and the City code on take-overs is considered.

The 'Notes on Auditing' of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales are reproduced in full, and the recommendations of the Jenkins Committee relevant to auditors are quoted.

This new edition has been designed to meet present-day needs, while preserving the distinctive character of the work.

JUST PUBLISHED THE SECOND TITLE IN
GEE'S SUPERVISORY MANAGEMENT STUDIES

GENERAL EDITOR: C. S. DEVERELL, M.A., B.SC.(ECON.), B.COM., F.C.I.S., A.M.B.I.M.

BUSINESS FINANCE AND COSTS

by C. S. Deverell

GEE'S SUPERVISORY MANAGEMENT STUDIES contains the reading which supervisors must have to widen their understanding and reach their peak of efficiency at work.

Business, Finance and Costs is the second volume in the series, the first being Industrial Relations and Communications. Other volumes cover production and personnel management skills respectively.

The business side of industry involves decision-making and choice on economic activity. What is to be the size of the firm and its scale of operation? Where is its plant to be sited? What does Government action give and demand of the individual company? Where does a firm get its capital for growth? What can its accounting system tell us of its health? How can a grasp of control procedures help the supervisor? We must also become more market-orientated. The author therefore ends with a brief survey which demonstrates that much more than salesmanship goes to make up successful marketing.

The growing numbers of supervisory staff who are following a National Examinations Board in Supervisory Studies (NEBSS) course or are attending in-plant training in their firm will find the book invaluable.

Mr C. S. Deverell is author of the successful Business Administration and Management, The Techniques of Communication in Business, Personnel Management and Management Planning and Control, and other books. His business career and his experience as head of management studies in a number of major colleges has given him a mature understanding of management and supervisory problems which is reflected in his writing.

ETHICS AND THE ACCOUNTANT by M. Barradell, LL.B., F.C.A.

EVERY ACCOUNTANT SHOULD HAVE A COPY FOR REFERENCE

The subject of professional ethics, which is no less important than professional competence in maintaining an adequate service to clients, has received markedly less attention from authors. Many accountants will perhaps encounter ethical difficulty but once in the course of their professional lifetime: but when that problem arises, the inevitable embarrassment and distress are not lessened by the difficulty (due to the lack of literature) of drawing upon the experience of others who may have been similarly confronted in the past.

The appearance of articles on this subject in The Accountant has given rise to much interest and the publication of this book will, it is hoped, be helpful and stimulate further interest therein. This book is addressed to the accountancy profession in general and not exclusively to the members of any individual professional body. Whilst the greatest care has been taken to preserve an objective viewpoint, the views expressed are the author's own, and have not received any official endorsement; for this reason, it should not be assumed that they would necessarily reflect the attitude of the governing bodies of the profession in a particular case. Members of professions are expected to maintain a high standard both of professional competence, and of behaviour towards one another and the public they serve. There are courses and study matter to assist in the maintenance of the former, but very little has been written on the subject of professional ethics.

The publishers hope that this book will provide a much needed addition to accountancy literature and be of interest to both practitioners and students.

Corporate Planning and Budgetary Control

J. BATTY, M.COM., A.C.W.A., M.I.O.M.,
M.B.I.M.

During the late 1960s the rapid development in business methods has meant that corporate planning has become a discipline in its own right. This book brings together the new ideas on budgetary control, company objectives, participative management, information systems and the need for a high level of efficiency. It provides a critique of modern methods of decision making. Accounting models, forecasting techniques, control of direct cost in the production field, research and development, and administration costs are discussed at length, and case studies of capital expenditure decisions of three typical companies are included.

Principles of Cost Accounting

C. J. WALKER, B.SC.(ECON.), A.C.W.A.,
A.C.I.S.

Many books have been written on cost accounting and the author of this book has aimed at providing a basic understanding of the subject by keeping figures to the minimum and by placing background subjects in appendixes. This textbook is designed for students taking examinations in cost accounting at the professional level and for those studying for the O.N.C. and H.N.C. in Business Studies. The subject matter of such examinations is adequately covered and, as an aid to the student, over 200 examination questions of the I.C.W.A. and the A.C.C.A. have been included, with model answers given in a Key published separately.

for the Chartered Accountants' final examination and for part of the General Paper at the intermediate level, will find this book of great value. It will also benefit those studying economics and finance for the examinations of the Institute of Cost and Works Accountants, the Chartered Institute of Secretaries, the Institute of Bankers and the Institute of Marketing.

Management Studies or similar examinations. In Chapter I a structure for production management is prepared, Chapter II outlines the system and succeeding chapters are employed to specify the product, design the process and control production operations.

Techniques are described only in outline so that they may be used in solving production problems.

Industry and Finance

B. K. R. WATTS, B.A.

Written by an experienced lecturer and extensively illustrated by charts and diagrams, this HANDBOOK surveys the essentials of the related fields of industry and finance. It will be found suitable for use by students preparing for the examination in Industry and Finance set by the Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants, for the General Paper of the final examination of the Institute of Chartered Accountants and, indeed, for any final professional examination where a knowledge of industrial structure, investment and finance is required.

Managerial Standard Costing

J. BATTY, M.COM., A.C.W.A., M.I.O.M.,
M.B.I.M.

A companion volume to the now highly successful Standard Costing, this new work is a comprehensive study of, and comparison between, the principles and practice of the managerial aspects of standard costing. After intensive research into the history and uses of this subject, the author provides completely new information about the role of standard costing as a tool of management, which will be invaluable for furthering the working harmony between accountant and manager.

Young Accountants

Thomson McLintock & Co. have vacancies for qualified accountants (and finalists with a successful examination record to date). Initially the work will be mainly auditing of a wide variety of public and private companies. There are early opportunities for experience of computers and of investigation work.

The work is demanding but is matched by above average remuneration and carefully planned training, which although geared primarily to the requirements of the man planning to remain in a practising firm, will prove valuable to the accountant moving into industry. For those interested in travelling there are opportunities overseas in our international firm after an initial period in the U.K. In the longer term the prospects for the able man to win promotion are outstanding in a rapidly expanding firm.

Write, giving brief career details, to:—

GEE'S SUPERVISORY MANAGEMENT STUDIES

GENERAL EDITOR: C. S. DEVERELL, M.A., B.SC.(ECON.), B.COM., F.C.I.S., A.M.B.I.M.

BUSINESS FINANCE AND COSTS

by C. S. Deverell

GEE'S SUPERVISORY MANAGEMENT STUDIES contains the reading which supervisors must have to widen their understanding and reach their peak of efficiency at work.

Business, Finance and Costs is the second volume in the series, the first being Industrial Relations and Communications. Other volumes cover production and personnel management skills respectively.

The business side of industry involves decision-making and choice on economic activity. What is to be the size of the firm and its scale of operation? Where is its plant to be sited? What does Government action give and demand of the individual company? Where does a firm get its capital for growth? What can its accounting system tell us of its health? How can a grasp of control procedures help the supervisor? We must also become more market-orientated. The author therefore ends with a brief survey which demonstrates that much more than salesmanship goes to make up successful marketing.

The growing numbers of supervisory staff who are following a National Examinations Board in Supervisory Studies (NEBSS) course or are attending in-plant training in their firm will find the book invaluable.

Mr C. S. Deverell is author of the successful Business Administration and Management, The Techniques of Communication in Business, Personnel Management and Management Planning and Control, and other books. His business career and his experience as head of management studies in a number of major colleges has given him a mature understanding of management and supervisory problems which is reflected in his writing.

LIFE ASSURANCE AND TAX PLANNING

by P. Harris and G. D. Hewson

This book deals comprehensively with the way life assurance fits into the framework of tax planning. The professional adviser is often aware that a very wide range of the problems encountered are susceptible to solution through life assurance and annuity arrangements, but life assurance and tax regulations which affect it are so complex that only full-time specialists can be expected to have a thorough grasp of every aspect. Written by specialists in the field of estate conservation, this book will be welcomed by the solicitor or accountant tax specialist who does not have time to study in depth every aspect of life assurance. It is designed also to appeal to the person whose work is not based exclusively on giving tax advice, but involves keeping very much in mind the tax connotations of income and capital.

REVENUE LAW

comprising Income Tax, Surtax, Capital Gains Tax, Corporation Tax; Estate Duty; Betterment Levy; Stamp Duties; Tax and Estate Planning

by Barry Pinson, LL.B. of Gray's Inn, Barrister-at-law,
Fellow of the Institute of Taxation

FOURTH EDITION

Pinson remains the only textbook treating the whole of revenue law in a single volume.

Since the publication of the third edition, the law of income taxation has been consolidated and the law of estate duty has been changed to such a degree by the Finance Acts of 1969 and 1970 as to out-date all existing textbooks on the subject. The fourth edition of Pinson has been updated to take account of all these changes and substantial parts of the text have been rearranged and/or rewritten to take account of the new statute and case law.

The famous 'Yellow Book' sets out verbatim the whole of the Income Tax Acts, Corporation Tax Acts and Acts related to Capital Gains as amended and as operative during the current tax year. Amendments are shown either by alterations in the text or by cross-references set against the old legislation. Even after consolidation, this edition covers no less than ten Acts and there is a Destination Table showing, for each repealed section or paragraph, the corresponding new legislation.

Stamp and Marley on Accounting Principles and the City Code: The Case for Reform

1970. By Edward Stamp, Professor of Accounting and Business Method in the University of Edinburgh, and Christopher Marley, Financial Editor of The Times.

The authors of this controversial book believe that recent take-over battles confirm their judgment that the needs of investors are not being adequately protected at the present time. In their book they aim to diagnose some of the problems confronting the City and the accounting profession, and to prescribe constructive solutions to them. Part 1, by Christopher Marley, deals with the City Code and the City Panel, their history and development, while Part 2, by Edward Stamp, concentrates on accounting principles and their deficiencies.

Final Part I Study Course
commences Monday, December 7th, 1970

Final Part II Study Course
commences Monday, December 14th, 1970

These courses, which are open to all Final students, regardless of whether they are taking Foulks Lynch correspondence courses, provide a valuable opportunity to consolidate the subject-matter studied since the commencement of the Final course. Their purpose is to give students a renewed interest from both a practical and theoretical viewpoint in the work they have been studying and to enable students to resolve any difficulties that may have arisen. A further advantage is to enable students to assess their progress and obtain guidance on their future methods of study.

Should the Pound Float?

PROBABLY no profession is as well placed to assess the effects of a government's economic and financial policies on industry and trade as the accountancy profession. Present indications are that the credit squeeze is still biting hard and, despite the fact that consumer expenditure is still higher than the Treasury would like, it is not sufficient to stimulate any revival of investment in the private sector. Not since Mr Wilson's 1964 election campaign have as many references been made to the 'stagnating' UK economy.

The recent improvement in the UK balance of payments has not made any significant difference to official, i.e., Treasury, attitudes on internal economic management. Nor is there any reason why it should. While the 1967 devaluation undoubtedly provided British industry with a significant opportunity for increasing exports, the real determinant in the strengthening external account was the boom in world trade and, more especially, the demand for imports from West Germany and the United States. By itself the mere adjustment of the exchange rate could hardly have brought about the remarkable turnaround in the UK balance of payments.

It is important to bear these basic facts in mind since the past week has seen a revival of the pre-devaluation controversy over the relative benefits and disadvantages of fixed and floating exchange rates. A new book, The Price of Economic Freedom, subtitled 'A Guide to Flexible Rates', by Mr Samuel Brittan, argues persuasively the case for abandoning the present policy of defending the fixed exchange parity of sterling. And in his presidential address to the Economics Section of the British Association at Durham, Professor Nicholas Kaldor has contended that the use of a managed floating exchange rate could serve as the main instrument in a new economic policy designed to achieve a more rapid rate of growth in the UK economy.

There is every reason why such proposals should have been put forward at the present time. They constitute a policy which, at least since 1945, has not been followed by any major economy in the world and, in terms of economic theory, can be argued logically. Furthermore, there is a growing suspicion that, like all its post-1945 predecessors in office, Mr Heath's administration has no clear-cut policy for dealing with the inflationary pressure generated by excessive demands for higher incomes. Hence, the adoption of flexible exchange rates offers a rational alternative to present policies dominated by the defence of the fixed parity. In theory, it could provide some flexibility within the economy within which a degree of growth could be initiated and developed without the present, apparently excessive, concern for the exchange rate and state of the reserves.

The critics of the post-1945 policies have a strong case: Professor Kaldor is reported to have criticized the post-war policies of internal demand management 'through fiscal measures and a system of fixed exchange rates, making use of exchange rate adjustments only in extreme situations of severe crisis'. Likewise, Mr Brittan's readable tract for the times details a number of serious criticisms, ranging from the trade policy restrictions to UK dependence upon US support at periods of sterling crisis which have emanated from the official policy of fixed exchange rates. He shares with Professor Kaldor the view that fixed exchange rates mean low growth rates and inadequate investment in industry. In particular, he stresses the implications of a continuance of undesirable government intervention in the economy.

The nearest approach to any official reaction to these powerful criticisms is a review in The Times by Sir Eric Roll of Mr Brittan's book. Sir Eric was, as much as any senior Civil Servant, involved in formulating post-war economic policy. For him, Mr Brittan is altogether too optimistic in evaluating the merits of this 'particular nostrum'. And, whether or not one approves of the present cautious Treasury approach, it seems reasonable to assume, not least in the light of the late Mr McLeod's last Parliamentary speech, that there are no grounds for changing the present policy. Hence, by implication, flexible rather than fixed exchanges do not – in the Treasury view – offer a means of escaping from the present combined impact of inflation cum stagnation.

The basic issues of exchange rate policy are, as Mr Brittan points out, quite simple. Economists are fully agreed on the theoretical pros and cons of fixed and flexible exchanges in given situations. As long as one is dealing with hypothetical economies or economic models, nothing is easier than to evaluate the appropriate policy, given the various pre-determined objectives. In the real world, however, the problem turns not on economics but on individual and collective judgements of reactions of governments, institutions such as trade unions, and the public. Where economists, like politicians, differ, is either in their ranking of objectives such as full employment and price stability, or their subjective evaluations of the probable efficacy of particular policies.

On such matters the views of the economist, financial expert or politician are worth no more, except to the extent that they may be better informed on the technicalities and the facts of the situation, than those of the average intelligent citizen. The latter is, after all, just as able and entitled as any of the former to claim, for example, that price stability is worth having even if it does – in the long run – mean half a million short-term unemployed. All citizens may agree that economic expansion is desirable but, equally, there exists corresponding concern that an expansionist policy will, in the absence of an effective incomes policy, intensify the present inflation.

The 1970 annual report of the International Monetary Fund reflects this concern with inflation which 'raises the most serious questions about the adequacy of economic policies pursued by the main industrial countries'. It notes, too, the increasing reliance being placed upon restrictionist monetary policies due to the inflexibility of fiscal policy. The latter is due to the rising levels of government expenditure which, in the UK, have reached the point where the public sector pre-empts half the gross national income. It is not surprising, therefore, that many people contend that more could be done to resuscitate the economy by cutting back government expenditure than ever could by means of flexible exchange rates.

No doubt the sight of a persistent depreciation in flexible exchange rates will ultimately induce politicians to take corrective action but, whatever the defects of a fixed exchange system, the prospect of denuding the nation's reserves does at least concentrate governments' minds wonderfully. The real danger of flexible exchanges is that unpleasant corrective action tends to be deferred until it is too late. The only result would be a further increase in import prices, thus raising the cost of living and aggravating the wage inflation.

It is quite true that the case for flexible exchange rates has been widely debated in recent years; fixed exchanges, like every other system, have their defects. But it is worth remembering the comments of the International Monetary Fund on the need for 'appropriate emphasis on the broad objective of financial stability, which is a basic prerequisite for a satisfactory economic performance'. In this context . . . 'particular attention focuses on what has come to be called incomes policy'. In short, if the basic weakness can be eradicated then the type of exchanges won't matter.

Courses Calendar

AS the summer holiday season draws to its close, the thoughts of accountants both north and south of the Border are returning to the subject of professional education. Next week both The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales and The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants will be holding their annual summer courses at Cambridge, and the Chartered Accountants of Scotland will open their 18th summer school at St Andrews.

The English Institute's programme at Churchill College, Cambridge, from September 16th to 20th, will be devoted this year to the single theme, 'What is profit?' A panel of six distinguished speakers has been assembled under the chairmanship of Mr D. S. Morpeth, T.D., B.COM., F.C.A., and the topical importance of the subject (culminating in the Price Waterhouse report on the Pergamon accounts, which formed the subject of our leading article last week) is attested by the fact that this course has been heavily over-subscribed.

In his foreword to the Cambridge brochure, Mr C. Croxton-Smith, M.A., LL.B., F.C.A., President of the English Institute, suggests that this consideration in depth of a single theme may well become the pattern of future summer courses, so that members of this year's course are taking part in an experiment which may have significant consequences.

Eight speakers will give their views on the use of management information at the 21st summer school of The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants at St Catherine's College, Cambridge, from September 14th to 18th. More than 120 financial executives and management accountants will take part in this year's intensive programme of lectures and group discussions.

The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland will be at the University of St Andrews from September 18th to 22nd, and is also expecting a record attendance. The broad theme of the school will be 'The direction and management of corporate bodies, and the disclosures which their directors should make in published accounts and forecasts.' This again is a subject of considerable topical importance, and papers from differing viewpoints will be presented by Messrs R. B. Jack, M.A., LL.B., J. McKinnon, C.A., A.C.W.A., A. M. C. Morison, M.A., C.A., and L. Layton, B.S., C.P.A.

Chartered Secretaries Review Policy

THE Chartered Institute of Secretaries, which celebrated its 75th anniversary in 1966, marked the occasion by the appointment of a policy review committee to plan for the policy and activities of the Institute in the 1970s. This committee was particularly charged to review policy and objectives with reference to the position of the Institute and its members in the professional, business, and educational fields, and to consider methods of stimulating the interest of members and students in the future activities of the Institute.

The Council of the Institute has now recorded the view that its future must lie in recognition as 'a broadly-based professional body, covering not only company secretaries but administrators of all types of organization', and that steps must be taken to develop services for members in fields other than that of the company secretary. Where such developments are at present covered by other professional bodies, any action by the CIS should be on a basis of co-operation rather than competition.

It is considered that the academic standard of the CIS qualification as comparable to that of a pass degree 'is correct at the present time', but the Council intends to review further both the academic content of the examinations and the requirements of qualifying service for membership.

Both the Council and the policy review committee confess their attachment to the present name of the Institute, which over the years has acquired a high value in terms of goodwill and reputation. It is, however, recognized that the name is no longer appropriate to describe the full range of the Institute's activities, and the Council proposes that it be amended to 'The Institute of Chartered Secretaries and Administrators'.

This change, together with other projected amendments of the Institute's charter and by-laws, will require to be approved by the members in general meeting. Arrangements are in hand for the distribution of explanatory material to members in November, to be followed by a special general meeting, probably in February 1971.

Probate Grants in Decimals

ANOTHER public body which intends to 'go decimal' on February 15th next is the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty division of the High Court. This is the effect of a practice direction issued recently by the senior registrar of the division.

With effect from October 1st, 1970, all documents (other than Inland Revenue affidavits and forms) lodged in the probate and divorce registries should be expressed in both £sd and decimal equivalents, according to the 'whole penny' conversion table. As from the same date, all orders, warrants and writs will be expressed in £sd followed by the decimal equivalent.

Grants of representation will be expressed in £sd only, up to and including February 12th, 1971. On and after February 15th, all orders, warrants, writs, and grants of representation will be in decimal currency only.

New Penny Policies

MUCH of the business of friendly societies and industrial assurance societies still depends upon the collection at frequent intervals of small individual amounts for which there may be no precise decimal currency equivalent. To meet cases where a society's own rules do not provide for decimal conversion, the Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies has made regulations for the conversion of payments under any friendly society, collecting society, or industrial assurance contract made before February 15th, 1971, but falling due after that date.

Generally the conversions rely on the standard new penny and new halfpenny tables, but special arrangements have been found necessary for payments falling due at intervals of two weeks or less, where the large number of individual payments might be abnormally influenced in total by the element of rounding-off in the standard tables. In such cases the regulations provide a four-week cycle of payments, with adjustments made as necessary in every second or fourth week. Thus, for example, four consecutive weekly payments of 8d each in present currency (total 2s 8d, or £0.133) become one payment of 3p and three of 3½p (total £0.135).

Copies of the Friendly Societies (Decimal Currency) Regulations 1970 (1s 3d) and of the Industrial Assurance (Decimal Currency) Regulations 1970 (1s 9d) are available from Her Majesty's Stationery Office.

Circulating Members' Resolutions

WHAT was said to be the first prosecution under section 140 of the Companies Act 1948, was heard at Marlborough Street Court on September 2nd. The summons was brought by a shareholder, Mr Bowes Egan, of Oakwood Court, West Kensington, in Westminster Trust Holdings, of Sloane Square, Chelsea, London, against the secretary and three directors of the company, and alleged failure to give notice of certain resolutions intended to be moved at the next annual meeting.

The magistrate found the charge proved, but gave the defendants an absolute discharge and refused to award costs against them. He said (according to The Financial Times of September 3rd):

'I have come to the conclusion that the complainant has made out the burden of the summonses. I should like to say that I think the directors acted throughout perfectly properly and entirely reasonably, having the opinion of counsel of vast experience in this class of work. They answered as best they could by their chairman, the questions posed by Mr Egan. I think in all the circumstances they were technically wrong, but no stigma is inferred or attaches to them.'

The point at issue was whether the directors had been correctly advised by leading counsel that the resolutions could not properly be moved. The prosecution submitted that the resolutions in question might properly be moved even though they would not be enforceable; that requiring directors to give information did not usurp or restrict their powers; and that there was no reason why a resolution should not require directors to give information they might not otherwise be bound to give. Some of the resolutions asked for information which the directors were under statutory duty to provide, whilst others required information which they were under fiduciary obligation to disclose, and they were not inconsistent with the articles of association.

Going Metric

BY 1975 most of British industry will be using the metric system, not just as a converted set of figures, but by new specification of dimensions and tolerances.

Most people in Britain are already familiar with some of the metric units. Basic to most metric measurement are the metre and kilogramme, and these units, or fractions of them, enter into most metric definitions. It is in thinking of basic quantities, weight, capacity, and length that any progress that can be made now towards familiarity with metric units will be most useful.

For many years there will be a transition period when, for example, replacement parts to capital equipment will still be specified in imperial measures, while new equipment will be specified in metric units, and in many fields both systems will be in use. It follows that even the general public will, for a considerable time, be using both systems, and that a large element of confusion is unavoidable. It can, however, be minimized by early familiarization in schools and colleges and through industrial training boards, but in terms of universal comprehension of metric quantities, all concerns using them should make a conscious effort to emphasize dimensions of their products in metric measures.

According to the Department of Employment and Productivity, almost 90 per cent of the world's population live in countries using or committed to using the metric system. This means that at present many British goods, which for domestic use are made to imperial standards, have to be substantially altered to metric standards for export purposes.

A new leaflet Going Metric - Everyday Units, now available from the Metrication Board, sets out the more common metric units and correct symbols for 14 everyday quantities including length, area, capacity, temperature, and weight. Copies of this leaflet can be obtained without charge from Information Division, Department 4, Metrication Board, 22 Kingsway, London WC2.

THIS IS MY LIFE

Fair Game

by An Industrious Accountant

MY order for the seven of us in the lounge bar included gin, scotch, and brandy with all the usual trimmings, and there was little change out of a fiver. 'Is that all?' I asked wryly, and they said jocosely: 'Pay up and like it.' Only Ned beside me muttered quietly: 'Fair game'.

The phrase took me back years to the seaside holiday he and I shared long ago, just after we qualified in the first flush of salaried status. Bill, who'd qualified with us, recommended the hotel. He'd be there as assistant barman, he explained smugly; he'd decided to spread his wings for the summer - no more fusty old balance sheets until he'd tried out the high spots.

We seemed to be getting very large gin-and-limes - the vogue drink of the thirties - from him for very small sums, which ultimately worried us somewhat. True to the finest traditions of the profession, we brooded. Bill was bearing the difference in cost in noble and brotherly silence, perhaps almost begging himself that we might fare better . . . it wasn't fair; we must call a halt at once!

But when taxed with generosity Bill nearly had hysterics and almost fell off his chair in his amusement. Beggary be so-and-so'd, he chuckled; he was making a packet. Those extra-large gins were just chicken feed! This liquor racket was a long sight better than totting trial balances.

Pressed further, he explained. First, a smart hand with the cocktail mixing could always get an extra glass out of the gin bottle. Then there was pricing; you find a bunch who'd downed a few already and for, say, a twenty-five bob order you say twenty-seven bob at least, and pocket the difference. They wouldn't question the prices for fear of being thought tightwads, specially if they had their girl-friends along. If they did press things, there was always the honest mistake to be smilingly acknowledged.

Next came the matter of tips, which had to be handled scientifically. Not just ensuring enough small coins in the change, but pushing your luck. With an affluent-looking character you bring the change as much as possible in bobs and tanners spread all over the tray; he'd feel a fool picking 'em up painstakingly one by one, and would leave a few behind for service.

The wet tray was the next best. Coins were harder to pick up, specially against a raised ledge, and characters got flustered with fumbling and left them behind. These were legitimate dodges, said Bill virtuously; he didn't hold with bringing along short change, as the other white-coated assistant did with the drunks, but what should one do if the drunks forgot to look for their change?

Then, he'd worked out rather a smart system for the lordly types who snapped: 'Charge it to room 43'. They didn't always keep their duplicate dockets - one must always get them signed as evidence, you know - and they certainly couldn't remember exactly how much it was a fortnight later. His 3's, he murmured, were easily changed to 8's.

At that stage our indignation erupted, almost disintegrating a five-year-old friendship with accusations of rotten low dishonesty. Bill insisted, however, he'd only tried it twice on bloated loud mouths too stingy to tip and too boorish to thank. It was after all an exercise in financial reckoning worthy of international tycoons, reconciling mentally till shortages against stock checks, and personal profit against service to one's pals, however unreasonable they might be.

Besides, he said, rich squandering soaks were fair game.

Sixth Conference of Asian and Pacific Accountants

Outstanding Occasion in Singapore and Kuala Lumpur

THE Sixth Conference of Asian and Pacific Accountants, organized jointly by the Singapore Society of Accountants and the Malaysian Institute of Accountants, was officially opened by Doctor Toh Chin Chye, Minister of Science and Technology in the Singapore Government, at the attractive modern Conference Hall in the City of Singapore on Monday, August 17th, in the presence of members of the diplomatic corps and other distinguished guests. The conference was attended by delegates and observers from Australia, Canada, Ceylon, Republic of China, Hong Kong, India, Indonesia, Japan, Republic of Korea, Lebanon, Malaysia, New Zealand, Pakistan, Philippines, Samoa, Thailand, the United Kingdom, and the United States of America. The first four days of the conference were held in Singapore and the final two days in Kuala Lumpur.

Dr Toh, in his opening speech, stated that it was the policy of the University of Singapore to act in consultation with the professional bodies and that the aim must be to balance academic education with professionalism so as to produce an educated accountant. The intake of accountancy students at degree level at the university had increased threefold in the past 10 years and it was noteworthy that a considerable number of women were now studying for accountancy qualifications. Dr Toh thought that accountants who received instruction in the local laws at Singapore University had an advantage over those trained abroad and that future entrants to the profession would include a higher percentage of locally trained graduates.

Chairman's address

In extending a warm welcome to delegates and observers, Mr Song Chwee Him, the Conference Chairman and a past-President of the Singapore Society of Accountants, said that the success of the five conferences held since 1957 demonstrated the need for such meetings which facilitated an exchange of ideas and experiences and promoted co-operation among accountants in the region.

Bearing in mind the fundamental economic changes which had taken place in the region in the past two or three decades and the probability that the rate of such changes will accelerate in the years ahead, he said that it was a matter of urgency for members of the profession to formulate a policy on the scope of their future activities and the steps to be taken to equip existing members and future entrants to the profession with the expertise necessary to meet the demands which will be made upon them.

He expressed the hope that the conference would bring about a close relationship among the accountants and the countries in the region.

Speakers at the first technical session. Left to right: Mr J. R. Harrowell, F.C.A., Vice-President of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Australia; Mr J. E. Maheu, B.A., M.Comm.(Ottawa), C.A., President of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants; Mr Han Kang Hong, Singapore Society of Accountants; Mr Song Chwee Him, Conference Chairman and a past-President of the Singapore Society of Accountants; Mr H. P. Dhondy, M.A., F.C.A.(India), President of The Institute of Chartered Accountants of India, and Mr F. A. Fernando, B.Sc., Director of the Philippine Institute of Certified Public Accountants.

THE SCOPE AND PRACTICE OF THE ACCOUNTANCY PROFESSION

The first paper of the conference was delivered by Mr J. Emile Maheu, B.A., M.COMM.(OTTAWA), C.A., President of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, who underlined the necessity for the accountancy profession to meet the challenge of rapidly changing social and economic conditions by planning for the future. He referred to the Executive Sub-committee on Planning established by the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants whose first task is to try to find 'a concise model of the future Canadian community'.

In the field of auditing, Mr Maheu submitted that the increasing demand from business, government and the general public for more speedy and comprehensive reporting required that the production of accounts must not be regarded as an end in itself but as a means of projecting future profits and dividends and, ultimately, future share market values. The auditor's function must, therefore, be expanded to include the expression of informed opinions on projective economic and financial information.

Mr Maheu considered that the second area in which the accountant has the opportunity to develop new activities is that of management services. Working in partnership and co-operation with professionals engaged in other spheres, the accountant can, and should, be in a position to put at the disposal of management advice covering all management's needs for financial and economic data for the purposes of both external reporting and internal planning, control, and decision-making. One of the problems arising from this concept was the need to define the responsibilities and area of practice of each professional group.

A third area of expansion which was of increasing importance to the accountant in Canada and in most other countries was that of general management. Following the success of the Canadian Institute's tax course, a management course had been set up to enable Canadian accountants to upgrade their management knowledge and skills to meet the managerial opportunities and the challenges currently being presented to them. Mr Maheu then outlined the steps taken by the Canadian Institute to provide specialized training for its members in such matters as computer technology, taxation and management.

Dealing with future recruitment to the Canadian Institute, Mr Maheu said that a 'blueprint' prepared for the Executive Sub-committee on Planning visualized that the entrance examination for the Canadian Institute would not entitle the successful candidate to engage in unsupervised professional practice. To acquire this right the member would have to undertake a period of training in the subject in which he wished to specialize, the training being under the supervision of a chartered accountant qualified in the speciality being studied. During the period of training, the student would write an examination geared to his speciality and, if successful, would be accredited and designated accordingly.

Mr Maheu thought that a more intensive effort would be made by the Canadian accountancy profession in presenting its story to the public and to financial and other bodies but that, in the long run, the profession would be judged by its standards of integrity and its performance.

Growth potential

Mr H. P. Dhondy, M.A., F.C.A.(INDIA), President of The Institute of Chartered Accountants of India, traced the growth of accountancy techniques which had developed with the increasing complexities in trade, commerce, and industry, and thought that by studying the significance of the changes that had taken place in the recent past it was possible to assess the potential for development in the accountancy profession in the years of accelerated social and economic changes which lay ahead in the developing countries of the Asian and Pacific region and, in particular, in India.

He referred to the major influence on the economies of the developing countries of government participation in industry and commerce, and the needs of the government to be supplied with financial and economic data and information of an accounting nature. In this, and in the area of economic planning and management of monetary and fixed policy administration, he thought the accountant could play an important part 'with beneficial effects to the nation's economy as well as his own standing in the community'.

The inflow of foreign aid and investment capital from the developed countries had been accompanied by requirements for more sophisticated standards of auditing and financial reporting, and Mr Dhondy considered that the accountancy profession was well-equipped to assist in the investigation of the efficiency with which foreign aid funds were used and thus to support the credit standing of the recipient. As foreign aid gave way to foreign trade, accountants, as well as their clients, would tend to 'go international' and this should promote increased internationalization of the profession.

Labour disputes

One field in which the accountancy profession in India could make a major social contribution was in the resolving of labour disputes by the preparation of data acceptable to both parties concerning wages, costs, prices, profits and productivity.

Mr Dhondy then referred to the necessity for members of the profession to keep abreast with modern computer techniques, and also expressed the belief that the increased call for specialization in various fields would require collaboration with members of other professions acting as a 'team', and stated that these possibilities 'are already causing experimentation with new concepts about the forms of organization that should be permitted for the practice of accountancy' in future years. This is a reference to a recent authorization given by the Indian Institute to the effect that where management consultancy and analogous services are rendered in conjunction with other professions, no objection will be taken to the sharing of fees or to the conducting of such operations through the medium of a limited liability company.

Members of the Canadian delegation. Mr J. E. Maheu, B.A., M.Comm.(Ottawa), C.A., President of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, right, with Mr R. D. Thomas, C.A., Executive Director of the Canadian Institute, and Mr J. N. Allan, Vice-President of the Society of Industrial and Cost Accountants of Canada.

The profession in the Philippines

Professor F. A. Fernando, Vice-President for External Affairs and Director of the Philippine Institute of Certified Public Accountants, presented a paper on the history and growth of the accountancy profession in the Philippines. The accountancy laws of the country restrict the practice of accountancy to holders of the certified public accountant certificate and have established a board of accountancy in which are vested powers to regulate the practice of accountancy and to set examinations for candidates for admission to the profession.

He pointed out that accountants had in recent years enlarged the scope of their practices to include management services, but he believed a greater degree of knowledge and expertise would have to be acquired before such services could become a generally recognized function of the CPA.

In a supplementary paper, Professor Fernando doubted the advisability of an accountant rendering management advisory services and independent auditing services at the same time to the same client. In holding himself out to perform management advisory services, the accountant was in danger of exposing himself 'to justifiable accusations that we are infringing the exclusive fields of another profession'.

Professor Fernando considered that the accountancy profession in the Philippines had done much to improve the standards of its members and the quality of new entrants to the profession but 'educators and board examiners agree that the quality of a large number of new entrants leaves much to be desired'.

He went on to mention that most of the big business entities in his country were branches or affiliates of foreign concerns and deplored the fact that the foreign head office invariably required the audit of its Philippines associate to be undertaken by some international accounting firm dealing with the affairs of the head office. There was thus a danger of the accountancy profession being concentrated in the hands of the large international accounting firms to the detriment of the local practitioner, and Professor Fernando suggested that an even more sinister consequence of this process could be that 'with so much vital information in its hands, with so much wealth and power, these accounting firms may well in due time be regarded as a threat to the security of the nation'.

As a possible remedy for this problem he submitted that requests by foreign concerns for accounting services should be channelled through the appropriate accountancy body of the country in which the services were to be rendered.

THE EDUCATION AND BASIC REQUIREMENTS OF THE ACCOUNTANT OF TOMORROW

At the second technical session on 'The education and basic requirements of the accountant of tomorrow', Professor G. G. Meredith, M.COMM., PH.D., A.A.U.Q., A.A.S.A., referred to the technological and financial advances and the increased intervention of government in the business and economic structure in the past decade which had affected the pattern of the profession. These factors had resulted in increasing pressures being brought to bear on the accountant to supply both internal management and the external investor with factual information on which to base decisions.

The status of the accounting profession appeared to vary from one country to another, and although the profession in the United States of America was numerically strong, had high entrance standards and probably led in accounting research, a recent survey by L. J. Seidler ('A comparison of the economic and social status of the accountancy profession in Great Britain and the United States of America'), suggested that members in the United Kingdom enjoyed a higher professional status than their counterparts in the United States.

Professor Meredith expressed the belief that in the 1970s the trend of development will continue at an accelerated pace – manufacturing, marketing and distribution methods will become more complex, ownership of companies will become more complex and government intervention and trade union intervention will make the operations of a firm more complex. All these factors would bring pressure to bear on the accountancy profession.

He suggested that there will be a tendency for greater co-operation between practising firms and between professional bodies, and that one could predict the amalgamation of many firms to provide bigger partnerships with partners and seniors specializing in particular areas and, possibly, loose associations between firms allowing specialization within the association.

To meet this changing situation, it was necessary for the accountant to have a grounding in economics, mathematics, logic, law, behavioural sciences, and allied disciplines, but this must be in addition to and not in place of a basic education in accountancy. Professor Meredith thought that undergraduate courses fulfilling the educational and basic requirements of members of the profession would not be satisfied with less than a four years' first degree course which could be planned as follows:

Year 1 – Foundation courses in economics, logic, behavioural sciences, mathematics and statistics.

Years 2 and 3 – Common core studies in accounting, law, finance, systems and administration.

Year 4 – Specialized study in management accounting, professional practice, government accounting (or related disciplines – law, systems) and research.

While this programme would suffice for future incoming students, provision must also be made for a continuing process of education of members within the profession and this could be achieved by in-depth study courses in particular subjects which, he suggested, should be of not less than one week in duration.

Best education methods

Professor Hou Kok Kee, M.COM., A.C.A.(N.Z.), an Associate Professor in Accounting and Finance at Nanyang University, Singapore, submitted that an accountant should have a sound general education in such subjects as the social, natural, and behavioural sciences and humanities. This would not only improve the accountant's understanding of the society in which he lived but would increase his ability to acquire new ideas and techniques. Since the function of an accountant is to act as a member of a management team, he must acquire also a general business education but, above all, he must have an expert knowledge of accounting, the ability to apply his knowledge and an awareness of the techniques available to assist him.

Professor Hou made the broad statement that 'educators and practising accountants generally accept the principle that accounting education can best be carried out by tertiary institutions rather than by articulated clerkships'. He also believed that the requirement of the Singapore Society that a prospective entrant to the profession should have practical experience in accounting 'may actually be little more than a carry-over from the days when accounting was learned only through apprenticeship', and suggested that a professional body could retain control over the educational standard of applicants for membership 'through the introduction of a so-called qualifying or final examination to be administered by the professional body itself'.

Nevertheless, Professor Hou considered that students for the profession could acquire practical experience during the long vacation under programmes organized jointly by the universities and selected public accounting firms. Like Professor Meredith, he underlined the need for continued education after entry into the profession and thought this should be the responsibility of the professional bodies.

The final paper of the second session was delivered by Professor Peter A. Towsey, Professor of Accountancy in the University of Singapore (and some time contributor to The Accountant). It was commonly held, he said, that the higher professional examination standards were, the better, and that the more practical experience, within reason, an accountant was required to have before recognition as an accountant, the better. However, Professor Towsey described both notions as superficial, naïve and unsound, and thought it necessary to 'debunk' them.

In his view, the right standard by which to measure a professional group is by the social dividend it yields to the community by comparison with the social costs of training its members. In considering examination standards, the choice lay frequently between quantity and quality and there was a point beyond which quantity could not be increased without some sacrifice of quality. In such cases a very slight lowering of educational standards plus a wider spread of education could produce a better educated society.

The problem was to get one's proportions right. The interests of a particular professional body were not necessarily the interests of the country of that body and he questioned whether the country might not be better served by having a larger number of accountants trained to a slightly less intense level of examination preparedness; a thinner but wider spread of officially recognized accounting skill.

While conceding that universities were inclined to under-rate practical experience, he questioned the necessity for a student to have a defined quantum of practical experience before being allowed to sit for a professional examination. Such a requirement should only be demanded of accountants seeking practising certificates, in other cases the assessment of experience (or lack of it) could be left to individual employers and society.

Professor Towsey said that it was not his intention to adopt a negative attitude to examination standards or practical experience: both were important but the two aspects had in the past received too exclusive an attention. Opportunities for providing practical experience were not entirely lacking in the universities and must be used whenever possible. He thought it clear that accountancy must develop on specialized lines but as long as specialization was built on a foundation of general education for all, there would still be some common ground on which 'we can communicate with each other'.

The universities could and should play a part in developing the specialized branches of accountancy and Professor Towsey thought that in due time universities would take over the examination function from the specialized bodies, but they must recognize the high standards attained by professional bodies and must try to emulate them.

THE USE AND LIMITATIONS OF ACCOUNTING DATA IN BUSINESS INVESTMENT DECISIONS

The third session of the conference considered 'The use and limitations of accounting data in business investment decisions'. Mr Robert Beyer, a managing partner of Touche, Ross, Bailey & Smart in New York and a member of The National Association of Accountants of the United States of America, who prepared the first paper, was prevented by indisposition from attending and in his absence his paper was read by his co-partner, Mr John A. Wilson, C.A.

Mr Beyer stated that all major investment decisions need to be guided by long-range strategic planning so as to direct capital investment into channels which offered the greatest earnings potential. Strategic planning was a function of top management but in so far as it was based on past experience, historical accounting data must, in general, be the starting point. Planning was the process of selecting from alternatives and here again the accountant could make an important contribution through his financial evaluation of the alternatives proposed. Short-range capital budgeting was the province of the accounting executive whose functions included not only the preparation of the capital budget and subsequently comparing it with the actual expenditure made, but outlining the sources from which the funds necessary to meet the projected expenditure were to be found. 'Opportunity costs', often pertinent to the assessment of an investment project, were sometimes overlooked by accountants. These costs were represented by such factors as profits lost by a company because it was unable to make prompt deliveries due to inadequate production capacity or because of obsolete or inefficient methods.

Mr Beyer then dealt with the various techniques commonly used in evaluating investment projects and the aids which were available, but underlined the fact that the soundness of the result achieved will depend on professional judgement, and not simply on techniques. Major responsibility for estimating project cost and revenue will not normally rest with the accountant. Such factors as forecasts of sales and expenditure on plant will fall within the province of the sales or engineering executive, as the case may be, and the accountant's role was to review the estimates provided for the purpose of the project to ensure their consistency and credibility in the light of past experience.

If management is to realize the expected return for an investment it must keep project expenditure within the amount estimated and the knowledge that there is to be a post-audit can play an effective part in achieving this. These functions were within the province of the accountant and if sound professional judgement is brought to bear in carrying them out they will not only assist in pin-pointing the reasons for discrepancies between the estimate and the eventual outcome, but will assist in the future evaluation of projects.

Greater clarity

The second paper on the use and limitations of accounting data was prepared jointly by Mr Touru Takezaki and Mr Taruo Kawaoka, certified public accountants in Tokyo, who made a plea for greater clarity in the form of accounts produced for the guidance of investors and management. In particular they considered that there should be standardization of the nomenclature used, more adequate disclosure of the principles applied in arriving at the results depicted in the accounts and a greater uniformity in international accounting terminology and auditing standards. To this end they recommended the establishment of an international council of professional accountants whose function would be to keep its members informed on the differences in procedures between the various countries and the consequences of these differences.

The authors referred to the very strict control imposed on accounting procedure in Japan by the Japanese Securities and Exchange Regulations and went on to discuss in some detail the factors which had contributed to Japan's rapid economic growth since the end of the war. They referred to the 'lifetime employment system' which is very popular in Japan and which 'allows all manufacturers to consider all labour cost as a fixed cost and only material cost as a variable cost'.

Manufacturers who were able to maintain normal operating capacity had tremendous growth potential as long as they could sell all their products, and they were able to export at extremely low prices. The Japanese Government, through the Central Bank, provided industries with sufficient capital to enable them to maximize overall economic growth but not enough to 'overheat' the economy. 'Companies operate at debt ratios (total debt to total assets) ranging from about 60 per cent to 80 per cent. They are generally permitted to stay in business so long as they earn enough profit to pay their interest on the bank loans. In times of inflation, the Central Bank tightens its flow of credit to force into bankruptcy the small marginal companies.'

The authors considered that this system of financing business was superior to that of financing out of retained profits since under the latter system the pressure on management was not so great and prices tended to rise because of inefficiencies. Although the Japanese method of financing 'is admittedly dangerous', it allowed the Government to provide industries with sufficient capital and enabled it 'to weed out the less efficient companies without disturbing the economic growth'.

It was pointed out that competition among enterprises in Japan was very keen, and the Ministry of International Trade and Industry estimated that approximately 83 per cent of Japanese companies based their operations on long-range planning. Encouragement was given by the Government to industry to accumulate and process reliable information systems to improve planning techniques and the accounting profession was holding seminars on management services to improve their usefulness in this area. With the objective of enabling management to adapt to changes in external environment, nearly 40 per cent of the major companies had organized a group project to improve the flow of information within industry.

THE AUDITOR'S ROLE IN THE EVALUATION OF MANAGEMENT PERFORMANCE

Mr James A. Miller, C.P.A., audit manager of Price Waterhouse & Co, New York, in presenting the first paper at this session, gave a number of practical examples which he illustrated with colour slides to demonstrate the benefits to be derived from the management audit. He suggested that the function of the management audit is to attempt to identify weaknesses or irregularities in management and that its aim must be to achieve continuous improvement in the company's organization and method of operation, for example, by improving the use of human and physical resources and ensuring the accuracy of information reported to the management. The management audit may cover the company as a whole or it may be limited to a single department and every management audit programme must be planned and staffed according to the particular circumstances attending the operation.

Members of the audit group will require a variety of specialist skills and must be a balanced team which will include technically orientated staff. It would be rare to find a member of such a team who could be regarded as an expert in all the skills required, but each member must be familiar with the various aspects of knowledge involved in the audit project.

Having planned the audit programme, the management auditor must collate his facts so that he knows not only what operations are carried out and how they are performed, but why they are performed. Mr Miller then outlined the procedure for obtaining such information – by the use of questionnaires and the preparation of charts, and by personal observation of the production processes, office organization, and the financial and other data provided for the information of management – and gave examples of the areas of inquiry to be explored.

He listed the fourth step in the management audit as the evaluation of the facts, although much of this process would develop in the course of the fact-finding operation. The success of the entire management audit project may well depend on the quality of the audit report and the completeness of the follow-up programme. The report should be made in simple language and recommendations presented in the order of their significance; it was suggested that the auditor should point out the value of adopting the recommendations and should state the reactions to the recommendations by the personnel involved.

By its very nature, much of the management auditing would be done by internal auditors, but independent accountants were playing an increasingly important role. 'The independence of the professional auditor and his high standards of business ethics can help give weight to his recommendations.' But, perhaps most important, his broad knowledge not only of his client's operations but of a vast number of other concerns made the auditor uniquely qualified to perform a service hitherto beyond his traditional function. 'It seems probable that the management audit will be an ever-increasing role for the auditor of the future.'

A natural development

The final paper at the session was contributed by Mr W. G. Philip, F.C.A., of Victoria, Australia. Mr Philip viewed the management audit as a natural development of the financial audit rather than as an extraneous and novel invention. The growth in size and complexity of the business unit imposed upon management the necessity to delegate some of its functions. As the result of this, the need arose to develop procedures which incorporated reliable internal controls over financial and operational functions and this process was encouraged by the auditor as being calculated to provide the best method of safeguarding the assets of the company. Where a satisfactory internal audit was practised, the financial auditor was justified in reducing considerably the volume of transactions which he examined so that he could direct his attentions to ensuring that the controls and procedures set down by management were in fact operating effectively.

The approach to auditing, said Mr Philip, had therefore tended to move away from the practice of detailed checking, and today the emphasis centred on the appraisal of the internal controls implemented by management. Impetus had been given to this development by the increasing demands for information made by financiers and debenture-holders and by the general public. In Australia recently, reports by inspectors appointed under the Companies Act drew attention to examples of bad decisions by management, the effect of which had been temporarily concealed from shareholders, and the publicity which these reports received had led to a demand that the auditor's function should extend to reporting in general terms on the overall performance of management. Although it was improbable that such an obligation will be imposed by law in the near future, the auditor should take the initiative and develop his skills so that he can expand the scope of his service to include reporting on the various aspects of management, and the professional bodies should develop and lay down a set of guide lines for the profession in this field.

Mr Philip defined a management audit as a review of administrative and operating controls carried out with the object of reporting on management performance and efficiency, and he suggested that the average auditor does not at present have the necessary expertise to carry out a comprehensive management audit, but 'there are many aspects of management controls on which most auditors are technically equipped to report', and a start could well be made in this field. But, in Australia at least, it would be necessary for the auditor to receive protection from the law of defamation before he is required to report publicly on the performance of management.

If management audits were to become an accepted practice he believed it would be necessary for accountants, Stock Exchange committees and management to agree on the principles governing the nature and scope of the audit. In his view, managerial audits should be confined to an examination of present and past events, and assessments on projections and forecasts of future events should be avoided. He further considered that the initial framework for the conduct of a management audit should be restricted to three areas, namely, procedural practices, financial aspects and organization of labour. The auditor would, for example, be expected to assess the adequacy of procedures adopted by management in connection with organizational procedures, long- and short-term planning, design, and operation of information procedures to enable management to make proper decisions, custodianship, and use of assets and funds, source and cost of capital used in the business, market assessment, and development organization and control.

Mr Philip submitted that the independent accountant was ideally situated to carry out a management audit, but he questioned whether the firm of accountants who were instrumental in affecting changes in procedures followed by a company could at a later date review them with the degree of independence generally considered to be essential for an effective audit. Integrity had a bearing on the auditor's independence, and the general acceptance of management audits would make the significance of integrity of the auditor even more important.

He went on to say that during the past 25 years the range of services offered by the auditor and the expertise necessary to perform these services had developed to a very considerable extent, and if all these services could be applied in the field of management accounting a tremendous impact would be made on management and industry generally. It was important for the profession to appreciate the added responsibilities which they would be expected to assume. 'If it is in the public interest that we should offer assistance to management, then let us develop our skills in this area so that we may be able to provide the services required of us. If we delay, then management consultants and others will take our place.'

Technical Sessions at Kuala Lumpur

The conference was reconvened at Kuala Lumpur on August 24th, and after a speech of welcome from Enche Shamsir Bin Omar, President of the Malaysian Institute of Accountants, Mr C. K. Notley read a paper prepared by Professor F. Devonport, M.COM., Professor of Accountancy at the University of Canterbury, New Zealand, on the subject of 'Objectives and effectiveness of direct taxes in New Zealand'.

Professor Devonport emphasized the necessity to ensure that any system of taxation, and the redistribution of income which it achieved, paid due regard to equitable considerations. He referred to the preoccupation of the accountancy profession in devising legitimate tax avoidance schemes for the benefit of clients and questioned whether the profession is as active in ensuring fairness in the fiscal system as it is in gaining tax advantages for some individuals in the community.

Although the primary purpose of taxation was to meet the cost of government, it was increasingly being used as an instrument of government policy in the management of the economy and for this reason it was desirable to achieve flexibility so that tax rates and the manner of their 'imposition' could be varied quickly and effectively. As a means of syphoning off excess purchasing power in the private sector, indirect taxes had in the past been used, but as the methods of collection of direct taxes changed to 'pay-as-you-earn', the latter had proved equally effective in regulating the economy. Incentives provided by subsidies and tax reliefs had also been used to direct the economy into channels which appeared desirable, but Professor Devonport suggested that the success of such measures was debateable.

In the private sector, the taxation structure may affect the timing of consumption between present consumption and capital formation and it may thus influence the rate of economic growth. In the author's opinion the tax system of New Zealand, by failing to provide incentives to private saving, had retarded the country's economic growth. Professor Devonport referred to the difficulties and inequities that had accompanied the extension of the pay-as-you-earn system in New Zealand to the collection of tax on business profits. He referred also to the transfer of costs of collection from the Inland Revenue Department to the business community which attended the introduction of the system.

Finally, he surveyed the effectiveness of the use of taxation in New Zealand as an 'instrument to increase private savings and investment, to encourage exports and research and to increase productivity, and found little evidence to indicate that recent taxation developments had made any material impact in these fields.

Tax collection and administration

Mr Paul Chan, B.A.(HONS), MEC., of the University of Malaya, and Dr (Miss) A. H. Lai, in the final paper of the conference, considered the main problems confronting tax collection and administration in under-developed countries generally.

Despite variations between individual countries, the authors stated that all the countries had common economic objectives. Firstly, they must strive for maximum efficiency in allocation to secure optimum living standards in terms of the resources available. Here, the fiscal policy could determine the necessary adjustments to the existing allocation, which sector of the economy was to bear the cost and the types of policy which would best achieve the desired ends. As part of the fiscal policy, taxation served to mobilize the resources required by the public sector and influenced the flow and pattern of resources devoted to private economic activity and capital formation.

Secondly, the under-developed country must stabilize its economy at near full employment levels – a difficult task because the economy was vulnerable to external market influences. The successful management of such an exposed economy required a flexible fiscal policy and foreign exchange measures in the short term and diversification of the economy in the long term. Finally, the under-developed country must achieve an equitable distribution of income and wealth without which economic efficiency would be undermined and political stability endangered. Progressive taxation was a valuable instrument which could be used to achieve this, and taxation might also be used to counteract inflationary or deflationary tendencies as they arose, but there were limits to the extent to which this policy could be adopted.

Since a tax structure must reflect the structure of its economy, a system which was highly successful in a developed country might be totally inappropriate to an under-developed economy dependent on the export of one or two primary products. In the former, the emphasis would be on personal and general taxes while the under-developed country must rely on commodity taxes and the taxation of imports and exports.

The key problem in the process of economic development is that of capital formation and it was submitted that taxes should be imposed so as 'to tape measures which would otherwise go into unproductive investment, hoarding, speculation, or luxury consumption'. In this category the authors placed taxes on land or property and the capital gains tax, which they considered to be 'under utilized'. Taxes on income could only be expected to make a major contribution as the economy expanded and in the initial stages a personal income tax on a narrow base with high rates of tax on large incomes was probably the most suitable. The conflict between the necessity to raise sufficient revenue for Government to fulfil its role and the desirability of having low rates of tax so as to encourage private investment could possibly be resolved by having high rates of taxation generally, with discriminatory tax treatment for specific areas of economic activity.

In considering the tax structure, the authors suggested that import and export taxes were more flexible than income tax and could be more easily regulated by building in 'automatic stabilizers'. But this flexibility might be a disadvantage in times of economic recession.

Personal income tax was an effective means of achieving re-distribution of income and wealth but, in common with oppressive death duties, its use must be limited so that risk-taking was not discouraged and the ability to accumulate capital was not removed.

Finally, the authors stated that provision must be made for the imposition of penalties sufficiently heavy to deter tax evasion. The system must also include provisions to ensure that the tax was collected promptly and it must be so planned as to be capable of adaptation to the requirements of a growing economy.

SOCIAL FUNCTIONS

A most generous social programme was provided by the Singapore Society of Accountants and the Malaysian Institute of Accountants for the benefit of delegates, observers and their ladies during their stay in Singapore and Kuala Lumpur. Dr Toh Chin Chye was the guest of honour at the opening dinner in Singapore and after a short address from Mr Wong Siong Poon, President of the Singapore Society of Accountants, the guests enjoyed a veritable banquet of Chinese food.

Delegates, observers and the ladies were entertained to lunch at a different restaurant on every day of the conference and in the afternoon of Wednesday, August 20th, were taken on a tour of the new industrial town of Jurong, visiting some of the modern factories built during the last five years on land reclaimed from jungle and swamp. After a cocktail party and reception given by the Singapore Society during the evening, the guests enjoyed a most entertaining programme of music, dancing and acting at the Victoria Theatre.

The Singapore session closed with a farewell dinner and dance and the conference adjourned to Kuala Lumpur. As a preliminary to the official proceedings, guests were entertained to dinner at the homes of members of the Malaysian Institute. A reception, followed by dinner and dancing, was held on the evening of August 24th. While delegates were engaged at the conference, the ladies were taken on sightseeing and shopping tours, and a mannequin parade was also arranged for their benefit. The conference closed with a farewell dinner and dance at the Hotel Merlin, Kuala Lumpur.

Part-payment in Satisfaction

by G. R. BRETTON, M.A., LL.B.

A debtor finds himself in financial difficulties. He approaches a tradesman, or some other person, to whom he owes money, explains his circumstances, and offers to pay in full settlement a lesser sum than the amount owing. The creditor, either because he is compassionate or because he considers it expedient, accepts the offer on those terms. The question which arises is whether the settlement is binding upon the creditor. Is payment of the lesser sum regarded in law as full satisfaction of the original debt, or can the creditor, having accepted the lesser sum, subsequently sue the debtor for the balance? This is a problem of frequent occurrence, and its proper solution is a matter of considerable importance to the business community.

Pinnel's case

THE answer which the law has traditionally provided to the question posed in the headnote is that the creditor is not bound by the settlement. This rule, which apparently originated in 1495, is set out in Pinnel's case ((1602), 5 Co. Rep. 117a):

'Payment of a lesser sum on the day in satisfaction of a greater cannot be any satisfaction for the whole, because it appears to the judges that by no possibility can a lesser sum be a satisfaction to the plaintiff for a greater sum.'

A recent illustration of the application of this rule is to be found in the decision of the Court of Appeal of Jamaica in Adams v. R. Hanna & Sons Ltd ([1967] 11 WIR 245). The plaintiff owed the defendant company £198 on a judgment debt. In June 1963, the defendants instructed their solicitors to issue a writ of seizure and sale in respect of that debt. On July 18th, 1963, the plaintiff wrote to the defendants asking them to accept a lesser sum in full settlement of the debt, and a few days later a bailiff, pursuant to the writ, levied upon goods at the plaintiff's house but did not remove them.

At the end of July the defendants instructed their solicitors to stay execution on the writ, and the following day informed the plaintiff that they were prepared to accept £86 in settlement. Towards the end of August the plaintiff paid this sum to the defendants and obtained a receipt 'in settlement of suit'. The defendants, however, did not inform their solicitors of the settlement, and the writ of seizure and sale was not withdrawn. In October the bailiff removed from the plaintiff's house certain property which was then sold by public auction. The plaintiff claimed damages for illegal levy against the defendants.

The central issue was whether the payment of £86 had in law extinguished or discharged the judgment debt. The Court, applying the rule in Pinnel's case, held that payment of the lesser sum did not discharge the liability of the debtor to pay the larger amount, that the writ of seizure and sale remained valid and enforceable, and that the plaintiff, therefore, had no remedy in law against the defendant in respect of its execution.

Qualifications to the rule

The general rule as stated is subject to qualification in the following particulars. First, where a debtor obtains from his creditor a release under seal in respect of the whole or part of a debt owing, the release operates at law to extinguish or reduce the liability of the debtor. Secondly, as the Court in Pinnel's case itself acknowledged:

'By no possibility can a lesser sum be a satisfaction to the plaintiff for a greater sum. But the gift of a horse, hawk or robe, etc., in satisfaction is good. For it shall be intended that a horse, hawk or robe, etc., might be more beneficial to the plaintiff than the money in respect of some circumstance, or otherwise the plaintiff would not have accepted of it in satisfaction. . . . The payment and acceptance of parcel before the day in satisfaction of the whole would be a good satisfaction in regard of circumstance of time; for peradventure parcel of it before the day would be more beneficial to him than the whole at the day, and the value of the satisfaction is not material.'

The proposition that, where the debtor and creditor have agreed to some variation in the manner or time (or place) for settlement of the debtor's obligation, the Court will not inquire into the value or sufficiency of the variation, but will regard it as consideration in full satisfaction of the original liability, clearly constitutes a significant qualification to the rule in Pinnel's case, and the application and development of this proposition has been of particular importance with respect to negotiable instruments.

Negotiable instruments

It was early recognized that it was at least arguable that payment of part of a debt by means of a negotiable security, instead of in cash, amounted to a sufficient variation in the manner of settlement to constitute consideration discharging the whole of the original debt. The argument was initially unsuccessful, for in Cumber v. Wane ((1721), 1 Stra. 426), where a promissory note for £5 was given, and accepted, in satisfaction for a debt of £15, the Court held that the creditor could still sue for the balance.

This decision was, however, commented upon with disapproval in Sibree v. Tripp ((1846), 15 M & W 23). There the defendant, who owed the plaintiff £1,000, was sued for this sum, and the action was compromised on the terms that the defendant would give the plaintiff promissory notes for £300. When one of the notes was not met, the plaintiff sued for the original £1,000. The Court, on the basis that 'if for money you give a negotiable security, you pay it in a different way', held that the plaintiff was not able to sue on the original debt. This decision was approved and followed in Goddard & Son v. O'Brien ((1882), 9 QBD 37), where it was held that a cheque for £100 in settlement of a debt of £125 was effective to discharge completely the debtors' liability.

Modern view

Even if it is conceded that the decisions in Sibree v. Tripp and Goddard & Son v. O'Brien can be justified on the ground that during the last century payment by negotiable instrument was popularly regarded as totally different from payment in cash, the perpetuation of those decisions at the present time would be anomalous and contrary to modern business practice. Such was the view taken by the Court of Appeal in D. & C. Builders Ltd v. Rees ([1965] 3 All ER 837), where Lord Denning, MR, commented:

'No sensible distinction can be taken between payment of a lesser sum by cash and payment of it by cheque. The cheque, when given, is conditional payment. When honoured, it is actual payment. It is then just the same as cash. If a creditor is not bound when he receives payment by cash, he should not be bound when he receives payment by cheque.'

Similar views were expressed by Danckwerts and Winn, LJ. Applying this principle to the facts of the instant case, it was held that the plaintiff company, which had accepted a cheque for £300 in settlement of a debt of £482 and had given a receipt 'in completion of the account', was not barred from recovering the balance of the debt.

The consequences of this decision are that the cases of Sibree v. Tripp and Goddard & Son v. O'Brien can no longer be relied upon, and that no distinction is now to be made between payment by cheque and payment by cash for the purposes of the rule in Pinnel's case. This proposition must be qualified, however, by noting that, in D. & C. Builders Ltd v. Rees, Winn LJ, excepted the case where the creditor has specifically requested that the payment be made by cheque rather than in cash. It may be added, further, that consideration has yet to be given to the case where a debtor endorses over a third party's cheque to his creditor, and that cheque is for a lesser amount than the debt. In view of the realistic attitude adopted by the Court in D. & C. Builders Ltd v. Rees, however, it is thought unlikely that legal significance will be attributed to this latter circumstance.

Equitable relief

While the elimination of the artificial distinction between payment by cheque and payment in cash may be approved, it may yet be considered unfortunate that a creditor should not be bound by his agreement to accept in full settlement a lesser sum than the debt owing. Justice is due to debtors as well as to creditors, and cases such as Sibree v. Tripp and Goddard & Son v. O'Brien afforded some protection to debtors, albeit by means of a technicality.

In D. & C. Builders Ltd v. Rees, Lord Denning, MR, was solicitous to make clear that, without resorting to such artificial devices, the Courts are able to stretch out 'a merciful hand to help the debtor'. Relying on the broad equitable principle first stated in Hughes v. Metropolitan Rly Co ((1877) 2 App. Cas. 439), and resuscitated in Central London Property Trust Ltd v. High Trees Houses Ltd ([1947] 1 KB 130), his lordship declared:

'When a creditor and a debtor enter on a course of negotiation, which leads the debtor to suppose that, on payment of the lesser sum, the creditor will not enforce payment of the balance, and on the faith thereof the debtor pays the lesser sum and the creditor accepts it as satisfaction: then the creditor will not be allowed to enforce payment of the balance when it would be inequitable to do so.'

Limitations

This principle, which is generally described as 'promissory estoppel' or 'quasi-estoppel', clearly goes far to mitigate the harshness of the rule in Pinnel's case. It is, however, subject to at least two important limitations. First, if the debtor is to be given the benefit of the principle he must persuade the Court that it would be 'inequitable' to allow the creditor to sue on the original debt. Hence, if the debtor has been guilty of improper or unconscionable conduct the Court will not bar the creditors' suit. In D. & C. Builders Ltd v. Rees itself it appeared that the debtor was not entitled to the protection of the principle, since he had held the plaintiff company to ransom, threatening that if the lesser sum were not accepted nothing would be paid, and the company had taken the lesser sum only because it was in desperate financial straits.

The second important limitation to the principle is that it can be invoked only as a defence to an action upon the original debt; it cannot be used as the basis of a cause of action. Thus, in Adams v. R. Hanna & Sons Ltd, where the plaintiff debtor brought an action claiming damages for illegal levy, it was held that the principle of promissory estoppel could not support such an action. Ecclestone, JA, stated the position thus:

'On a careful examination . . . it would seem that the principle may be applicable by way of a defence to a debtor where a creditor seeks to recover as a balance due moneys said by the creditor to be owing after he has agreed with his debtor to accept a small amount But to say that in an action such as this for the tort of trespass to goods brought by the original debtor against the original creditor it would be inequitable to allow Hanna & Sons Ltd, as defendants, to plead the defence of nudum pactum would be placing an unfair restriction on a party.'

Special cases

Two classes of cases remain to be noted in which it is well established that the law will protect debtors where payment of a lesser sum than the original debt has been accepted. The first concerns the practice of debtors to make general arrangements with their creditors whereby each of the latter agrees to accept in full satisfaction a stated percentage of the debt owing. Strict application of the rule in Pinnel's case would clearly render such arrangements ineffective in law to extinguish the original debts. The Courts have, however, upheld such arrangements on the basis that to allow any creditor to go behind them, to the prejudice either of other creditors or of the debtor, would be a fraud on all the parties concerned.

Similar considerations explain the solution adopted in the second class of case to which reference is here made. Where a debt is owing by A to B, and a third party, C, pays to B a lesser sum in full settlement of that debt, the Courts will not permit B to sue A for the balance. Making the analogy with general composition arrangements with creditors, the Courts have reasoned that to permit the creditor to sue in this situation would amount to condoning a fraud on the third party.

Each of these classes of cases is well recognized as an exception to the general principles of the law of contract, and the protection afforded to debtors in these cases is not dependent upon either the qualifications to the rule in Pinnel's case or the doctrine of promissory estoppel.

The Valuation of Unquoted Shares

by R. A. STOCKWELL, B.A., A.C.A.

The valuation of unquoted shares is a subject which does not lend itself to an arithmetical formula, as so many factors are involved. The whole concept has been described as 'a dim world, peopled by the indeterminate spirits of fictitious and unborn sales'. In this series of three articles the author considers (1) valuations generally; (2) valuations for estate duty; (3) valuations for capital gains tax.

THE valuation of shares in private companies has been necessary for almost eighty years, since the introduction of the Finance Act 1894. This Act, which was concerned with the passing of assets in an estate for estate duty purposes, brought in the concept of the 'open market' for the purpose of valuing assets at the date of death. The Finance Act 1940 introduced special valuation rules where an estate consisted of shares which formed the majority holding of the controlling shares in a private company. The professional adviser therefore had to deal with fairly infrequent disposals of shares for valuation purposes and, as such, the problems of valuation were only met with occasionally. Furthermore, in the best interests of the client, the professional adviser was concerned with negotiating as low an estate duty value on the shares held by the deceased's estate as was possible.

However, since the introduction of the Finance Act 1965, the whole concept of share valuation has become of far greater importance, as an individual can make various disposals during his lifetime which may be the occasion of a charge for capital gains tax.

A present day feature of the United Kingdom economy is the increase in the type of company the economist calls 'the multi-product firm'. Companies are tending to spread their activities into fields which would have seemed alien to them some fifteen years ago. This diversification is frequently achieved by the purchase of private companies, often family businesses, which then become a subsidiary of a public group. The former shareholders of the private company have a capital gains tax problem, and whilst it is not necessary to value the shares at disposal date as the cash proceeds will represent this value, it may be necessary to value the shares at April 6th, 1965.

Approach to valuation

In this series of three articles the present one deals with factors which have to be considered before any valuation can be attempted; the second article will deal with the peculiar problems necessary to value shares for estate duty purposes, primarily those arising under section 55 of the Finance Act 1940; the third article will consider the valuation of shares for capital gains tax purposes. In dealing with the subjects of the first two articles, there is some 70 years of case and statute law to facilitate the interpretation of various important factors and considerations necessary for the purposes specified. When, however, shares are being valued for capital gains tax purposes, the legislation dates only from 1965 and this article will contain various comments which — although not substantiated by case law — may, it is hoped, be used in any argument or discussion arising on the valuation of shares for this particular purpose.

It is unlikely that the professional adviser will now try to place as low a value as possible on any shares that have been disposed of with no further thought. The 1965 Act required the professions to consider a number of factors which prior to 1965 were completely unnecessary. The lower the valuation of shares for estate duty purposes, then the lower the liability to estate duty, but in some cases it may be worth while to argue a high estate duty valuation, thus creating a high acquisition price for the legatee with a corresponding reduction in his potential capital gains tax liability on some future disposal.

In approaching the problem of valuing shares in a particular private company for some purpose arising under the Finance Acts, there are two problems to be faced:

- (a) the method of valuation of the shares; and
- (b) persuading the Shares Valuation Division of the Inland Revenue to accept the valuation.

This particular article is mainly concerned with the method of valuation and there are various factors which have to be considered before any valuation is commenced. While the following points are not intended to be exhaustive, it is hoped that they may provide a useful guide to the potential valuer.

The articles of association

Every valuer is aware of the overriding clause normally contained in a private company's articles of association whereby the directors have an absolute power at their discretion to refuse to register any particular transfer of shares.

From the valuer's point of view, such a clause is obviously of importance and one can imagine the low valuations that could arise if such a clause were allowed to influence the valuation of shares. Fortunately case law provides the answer to the valuers' problem in this particular case. The Mann Crossman and Paulin case (I.R.C. v. Crossman [1937] AC 26) dealt with this very point and, while the Court did not say that the restriction on transferability of a private company share should not be considered in any valuation arising, it did say that for valuation purposes this pre-emptive right by the directors has to be ignored.

Perhaps it is fair to say that a feature of the United Kingdom economy in Victorian times was the private company engaged in heavy industrial manufacturing. These companies were substantially asset-backed companies. However, a feature of the modern age has been the concept of the company based on an 'idea'. These latter companies have little asset backing and the return on capital invested may be very high. A good example of this type of company is that formed to exploit the particular talents of highly paid entertainers in 'pop music'. These companies depend for their large profits on the vast earning potential of one or two individuals, and the speculation involved in acquiring shares in a company of this type, where the highest income-earning asset may fall out of favour overnight, illustrates one extreme with which the valuer may be faced.

In many private companies the founder of the company provides the dynamism for the initial growth, but after his death there may be limited ability in the future family members of the management team. In a company where this sort of situation arises and the company is in its second generation, one must make careful inquiries about the class of management before considering any future prospects of the company concerned.

Management prospects

This naturally arises when considering future prospects. It may well be that professional managers are members of the board of directors and, if such is the case, then the problems of family inheritance may not arise. One should, however, consider in any company of reasonable size whether adequate provision has been made for future management and also whether the company is successfully facing the problem of retaining its young management men for future promotion.

In modern trading conditions with the features of the stop-go economy, it is rare to find a company with a steady profit trend, and, with the frequent credit squeezes that have been a feature of the economy in recent years, profits have obviously tended to fluctuate. The valuer must also be wary of optimistic forecasts in profit trends and it is suggested that he should go no further forward than one year ahead when estimating the level of future profits.

Profits have to be considered particularly in relation to the valuation of minority shareholdings where the income position is of prime importance, and, when dealing with small minority holdings, the comparison of yields with public companies becomes of little value. With the present 'cult of the equity' whereby the whole idea seems to be to invest for growth rather than income purposes, the dividend yield on many public company shares has become almost absurd.

This article has already referred to the speculative investment based on an 'idea'. In such a case there may be little asset backing for the shares, and the income position is of great importance. There is no doubt that fortunes have been made from such an 'idea', usually by capitalizing the talents of the founder of the company by going public. It is suggested that the conservative valuer should place high importance on income when valuing shares of a speculative nature, and should consider the required dividend to be fairly high.

Capital and asset position

This particular heading is concerned with the financing of a company's business. Since the introduction of corporation tax in the Finance Act 1965, the debenture has replaced the preference share as the fixed interest capital in a company's financial structure, as the interest paid to debenture holders is an allowable charge in computing the taxable profits of a company.

The presence of debentures, bank overdrafts, mortgages and loans and the security offered to obtain them must be considered because it may well be that the ordinary shareholders have very little asset backing for their investment apart from the 'goodwill' of the company in which they hold shares.

Since the introduction of the Companies Act 1967, directors have had to show the estimated value of land and buildings as a note on the accounts, and the valuer has far more information to enable him to consider the asset position of the company. The increase in land values since the early 1960s has given many private companies a highly valued asset which may be potentially ripe for development should the company ever decide to sell. When valuing shares in a company where the sort of situation may arise, the valuer must always consider the possibility of sale, though it should be remembered that there is always an underlying liability to the Treasury in respect of any disposal.

Liabilities of the company

When considering the creditor position of the company, the valuer is concerned with establishing that the cash flow position is adequately maintained. The company that requires the whole of its working capital to finance its debtor position is considered to be overtrading. The maintenance of a stable equilibrium between debtors and creditors is of paramount importance, and may be considered to be a reflection on the management of the company concerned.

Relative size of the holding

When considering this aspect, the voting rights of particular shares are of prime importance. Preference shares often carry no voting rights except in a winding-up, so the relative size of the holding is of real importance only where the shares concerned carry some voting power. It is suggested that the size of holdings may conveniently be apportioned between the following margins:

- (a) 75 per cent or more: this size of holding gives almost complete control of a company. It enables the holder of these shares either to continue trading or to liquidate the company at his will.
- (b) 50.1 to 74.9 per cent: this size of holding gives practical control. It enables the holder to run the company completely in accordance with his wishes and the only power that is denied to him is the power of liquidation without the consent of other shareholders.
- (c) 50 per cent: this position may depend on the casting vote in the event of deadlock so such a position can either amount to practical control or an effective minority holding depending on where the casting vote is placed.
- (d) 25.1 to 49.9 per cent: the power contained in this size holding is the power to block a special resolution. The holder can therefore prevent the liquidation of the company.
- (e) 25 per cent or below: this size of holding will normally only give rise to the right to a dividend.

Extent of a possible market

The valuer must consider the prospective purchasers in the hypothetical market. The type of hypothetical purchaser must be considered in relation to the size of the holding and the size of the company. They may, therefore, include:

- (a) the existing shareholders of a company;
- (b) surtax payers who will require growth rather than income;
- (c) investment trusts;
- (d) merchant banks or their clients;
- (e) industrial holding companies, i.e., the multi-product firm;
- (f) competitors anxious to increase their market shares or remove competition in order to achieve a more favourable pricing policy;
- (g) pension funds anxious to achieve growth for their members;
- (h) the general public.

In addition to the various points that may assist the valuer before he commences his valuation, mention must be made of the benefit that can be obtained from the accounts of private companies. The introduction of the Companies Act 1967, has assisted the valuer in that all private and unquoted companies are now required to file statutory accounts with the Registrar of Companies.

Dividend record

The dividend record of a private company has to be approached with extreme caution. The valuer should consult the statutory records of the company to see if the directors and shareholders are the same people. If this is the case, the dividend policy of the company may be of little practical importance as the directors will have maximized their earnings and minimized their personal and company taxation liabilities by drawing the profits of the company as directors' remuneration. The introduction of the Finance Act 1969 may well result in more realistic dividend distributions, but it is arguable whether the creation of a statutory dividend rate for close companies can be regarded as a useful commercial guide to dividend policy. In the case of investment holding companies the required standard of distribution is 100 per cent, and therefore, the valuation of shares in such a company becomes extremely difficult as the profits available for plough-back purposes may be no more than 2s 9d in the £.

However, where the statutory information discloses that there are outside shareholders in a private company, then the dividend record can be of considerable value. If this sort of situation arises, then the number of times the dividend is covered by profits may be of assistance; profits in this case being profits after tax and available for distribution through the profit and loss account. It is worthy of note that the preference dividend must be provided for before the calculation is made. This calculation is also effective in giving the plough-back rate of profits but one must remember the difficulties of the legislation in 1965, especially with a trading company having a required standard of 60 per cent for distribution purposes.

Balance sheet

It must be emphasized that the balance sheet that is presented to shareholders does not show the net worth of any undertaking. This is especially true of private companies where the freehold property may have been purchased many years ago at what is now a nominal cost. The Companies Act 1967 helps in some respect with this difficulty, but that Act requires no more than a director's valuation of the property concerned and one well knows how conservative director-shareholders may be in their valuation. The cost of an annual valuation would be out of proportion to its use, and of no material value to the profitability of the concern. True profitability could only be established by a complete revaluation of every asset held by the company at the end of its accounting period, and such a task is completely impractical to the day-to-day running of the concern. On the other hand, assets are worth no more than their earning potential, and goodwill has no value when isolated from profits or tangible assets.

The break-up values of a company are only really relevant to the valuer where the assets have high values but there is low profitability. In this situation the valuer must envisage that bad debts may often be higher than normal once the company has ceased to trade, and that substantial claims for redundancy payments may arise. In addition liquidation costs may be substantial.

It is, however, worth while to consider some of the various classes of assets that appear on the balance sheet:

(a) Fixed assets

Mention has already been made of the difficulties concerning freehold property. In inflationary times the question of valuation of all the fixed assets is perhaps too rarely considered by the professional accountant. There are few private companies such as Philips, of the Netherlands, who incorporate an asset replacement reserve in their accounts and are therefore able to some extent to show the replacement values of assets in their statutory accounts.

(b) Loans

Loans to existing shareholders can be a source of potential embarrassment as these are often left on current account and an outside purchaser coming in must always envisage the possibility of the holder of the loan requiring immediate repayment.

(c) Current assets and liabilities

Any deficiency of current assets as compared with current liabilities should be looked at with the greatest care, especially cash and debtors in relation to creditors. In the time of a credit squeeze, the company may find itself unable to meet its normal outgoings on a day-to-day basis, its dividend prospects may be impaired and there may be a need for the injection of new funds.

When considering the balance sheet of the company, the valuer should look at the gearing position. Where the proportion of equity capital in relation to total capital is small the company is said to be highly geared. In a highly geared company profits may be absorbed in meeting the claims of loan stock, debenture stock and preference shareholders and thus the ordinary share becomes in the nature of a speculative investment.

If a company can earn 20 per cent on capital employed, it is obviously beneficial if the company can borrow on loan at 10 per cent rather than face an embarrassing situation with its equity shareholders requiring a higher dividend. The potential investor in a private company must by definition be an individual who is willing to hold his shares for a considerable length of time because of their lack of transferability. Therefore, in a private company, dividends are of a greater importance than growth when valuing minority shareholdings.

One must contrast the above situation with the normal investor in quoted securities who today goes for capital growth where tax is limited to 30 per cent or less, rather than for income where tax is at 41.25 per cent plus the relevant amount of surtax. This fact will perhaps serve to emphasize the difficulties if any valuer endeavours to compare a private and a public company. In the case of Holt v. CIR (32 ATC 302), it was suggested that with the profit level being around the £1 million mark, it was valid for the company to be compared with a public company. This is perhaps true, but for the majority of private companies where size and profit records prevent them in the foreseeable future attaining public status, this comparison has no merit whatsoever.

When the valuer has considered all of the preceding factors, together with any others which may influence his valuation, he is then faced with the method of marshalling these facts into arithmetical terms. For this purpose he must consider his method of valuation. He will have to decide whether the shares should be valued on a dividend yield basis or on a price/earnings ratio basis and will decide accordingly what dividend yield or price/earnings ratio is appropriate. It will perhaps be useful to show how these two methods of measurement are calculated:

(i) The dividend yield

This is often defined in the formula $N \times D = P \times Y$ where N is the nominal value of the share, D the actual dividend rate paid, P the price of the share and Y the yield. When valuing a small minority shareholding, this calculation is usually the best method to adopt.

(ii) The price/earnings ratio

This is calculated by dividing the market value of the shares by the available profit, and it is suggested that this ratio (which is becoming of increasing importance in the United Kingdom) be used for substantial minority and majority holdings of shares. When considering the price/earnings ratio, regard must be had to the assets backing of the shares, especially where a majority holding is involved. The asset value of the shares may, therefore, be usefully calculated but the use of the price/earnings ratio will show whether 'goodwill' or 'badwill' is present.

It is, therefore, suggested that the method of valuation of shareholdings should depend on the size of the holding as follows:

- (a) 0-10 per cent: Nominal value;
- (b) 10-25 per cent: Dividend yield;
- (c) 25-49 per cent: Price/earnings ratio;
- (d) A majority holding: An asset position, subject to variation on a price/earnings ratio basis to show up goodwill or badwill.

Use of Bank rate

It is now relevant to consider what dividend yield to use, or what price/earnings ratio to adopt. As regards the former, it is suggested that bank rate may often be a useful yardstick to form the basis of the calculation of the price of a share. Bank rate is generally considered to be the interest rate on which all other interest rates in the economy depend, and it is suggested that bank rate at the time of valuation should form the commencement of the valuation. This basic figure may then require to be adjusted to take account of any of the foregoing features applicable to the company.

When considering the relevant price/earnings ratio, then one must turn to the Stock Exchange to find a suitable comparison and it is suggested that the price/earnings ratio shown by public companies in a similar sort of industry should form the basis of the valuation under this particular heading. This ratio will require to be adjusted in the same way as the dividend yield above.

It is hoped that the above considerations, together with further considerations that the valuer may consider relevant will provide a sound commercial backing to the valuation of shares. It is next necessary to consider the legal principles involved, so that this commercial validity may be linked with the correct application of statute law before any attempt is made to approach the Share Valuation Division. This should constitute a thorough preparation by the valuer of his case prior to submission and it is hoped that if a flexible approach is maintained, together with a willingness to listen to the commercial and legal arguments put forward by the Share Valuation Division, that a price may be agreed which will be acceptable to both parties.

How to make money when times are hard

Over the year ending 31st August 1970, the value of an Investor Policy unit increased from 28/9 to 31/8, a rise of 10.1%. Over the same period, there was a corresponding fall of about 0.7% in the Financial Times-Actuaries All Share Index, adjusted for net income and future liability to Capital Gains Tax. Of 182 unit trusts examined by 'The Unitholder' in January 1970, only 6 bettered the performance of the Investor Policy in 1969, and several of these were of a specialised nature.

On a short-term view, 1969 was not a good year for ordinary shares. But the Investor Policy is not a short-term contract. Company Distributions and Taxation Shareholders now participate in diverse ways in the income and capital share-outs from companies. H. S. A. MACNAIR, F.C.A., examines in the context of income tax the problems already encountered in the UK and abroad, particularly in the Common Market.

If it is correct to say that developments in English law have proceeded on an empirical basis, with scant attention to a theoretical framework, then company law is an apt illustration of this method of growth. One can perhaps discern the interaction of two opposing influences – regulatory legislation contrasted with concessions to business convenience.

The subject-matter of this article is primarily that of the outflow of funds from a company to its members. In this context there is a little to be gleaned from the accountancy bodies' memorandum Companies Legislation in the 1970s (The Accountant, March 29th, 1969), although it is remarkable that this document does not concern itself with the trend of company requirements in the European Economic Community within which we may expect to find ourselves before 1979.

Article 22 of the Treaty of Rome provides that member states shall, so far as necessary, engage in negotiations with each other with a view to ensuring for the benefit of their nationals certain objectives, notably the elimination of double taxation within the community. Another main objective is the mutual recognition of companies, the maintenance of their legal personality in cases where the registered office is transferred from one country to another, and the possibility of companies subject to the municipal law of different states forming mergers.

Identification of shareholders

The reference to 'municipal law' is to be understood as relating not to local authority bye-laws but to separate national laws, such as those of England and Scotland. In the Royal Institute of International Affairs publication (jointly with Political and Economic Planning) of Dennis Thompson's The Proposal for a European Company (page 37) the point is made that the existing legal framework within which companies operate in various areas of the community presents marked differences, although definite progress has been made towards mutual recognition. The differences are sufficiently significant, however, to encourage the development of an 'SE' (Société Européenne) – a European company to be devised under statutes recognized throughout the community.

The gulf which separates United Kingdom shareholders from their Continental counterparts is, however, wider than the Channel. The bulk of the shareholdings in Europe are represented by bearer shares whereas registered holdings predominate in the United Kingdom. Section 83 of the Companies Act 1948 authorizes the issue of share warrants, and the treatment of these and other securities passing by delivery is recognized by Rules 134 to 141 of the Stock Exchange. Nevertheless the rarity of bearer shares has made it possible for UK tax laws to be built up on the assumption that the identity of the ultimate beneficial owner is traceable through the registered holdings.

Income tax on distributions

Income tax under Schedule F is chargeable for any year of assessment in respect of all dividends and other distributions in that year of a company resident in the UK which are not charged under any other schedule and which are not specifically exempted from the tax (section 232 (1) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970). It will be observed that the scope of Schedule F is confined to shareholders' interests (including preference shares) and it is incorrect to apply the Schedule F label to the innominate income tax withheld from yearly interest and other annual payments in accordance with the rules of Schedule 9, even though those rules have parallel effect for the purposes of Schedule F. The burdensome character of schedule 9 (formerly schedule 12 of the Finance Act 1965) is likely to be mitigated with effect from 1971–72 by regulations to be made by the Board of Inland Revenue under the authority of Part I of Schedule 4 to the Finance Act 1970.

In general, references to distributions do not apply to those made in respect of share capital in a winding-up. The principal category of distributions comprises any dividend paid, including a capital dividend. The latter item appears to have been mentioned as a matter of caution, because the so-called capital dividend differs from any other dividend only in the absence of any authority for the paying company to withhold income tax. In Cenlon Finance Co Ltd v. Ellwood (41 ATC 11; 40 TC 176) the House of Lords accepted the proposition that an 'income dividend' was exonerated from the payment of income tax by the recipient through its attribution to the profits of the paying company by virtue of section 184 of the Income Tax Act 1952. Such 'income dividends' were treated as income for the purposes of income tax and surtax by section 185, but the treatment of a 'capital dividend' fell to be dealt with on the basis of its character in the hands of the recipient. Since April 6th, 1966, the distinction has no significance as regards dividends chargeable under Schedule F.

Capital dividends from overseas

A company is resident in the United Kingdom for tax purposes in accordance with the criteria for identifying residence. As adumbrated in De Beers Consolidated Mines Ltd v. Howe (5 TC 198), the test of residence looks to the place where the real business is carried on, that is where the central management and control actually abides. Any difficulties in applying this test are liable to be solved in favour of a UK residence by the acceptance of the possibility of dual residence. This is illustrated for the overseas subsidiary of a UK company by Bullock v. The Unit Construction Co Ltd (38 ATC 351; 38 TC 712) and for a UK company which sought to remove its control abroad by The Swedish Central Railway Co Ltd v. Thompson (4 ATC 163; 9 TC 342) although since 1951 no such removal is possible without Treasury consent under what is now section 482 of the Taxes Act. The UK residence of a company owned from abroad but operating in the UK (where the overseas directorate attended for formal business) was established in John Hood & Co Ltd v. Magee (7 TC 327).

It is the duty of a Court of Law to solve the problem presented to it even if the evidence adduced falls short of what is considered desirable. In CIR v. Trustees of Joseph Reid (Deceased) (28 ATC 65; 30 TC 431) the question arose as to whether a so-called capital dividend was correctly includible in an assessment under Case V of Schedule D. That heading of charge was established by the Act of 1842 although there can then have been few, if any, foreign companies. However, the propriety of including dividends from foreign companies in Case V was established in W. M. G. Singer v. A. W. Williams (7 TC 419).

In Reid's case it was common ground that the dividend in question had been paid out of realized capital profits by a South African resident company. Lord Simonds pointed out that the UK Revenue authorities did not have necessary means to inquire strictly into the character of such a dividend as capital or income and observed: 'They must work upon a broader basis, and I cannot imagine a safer or better one, where the question is as to income arising from a foreign possession, than to ask whether the corpus of the asset remains intact in the hands of the taxpayer.' In that instance the shares held before the dividend remained intact.

However, in Rae v. Lazard Investment Co Ltd (42 ATC 84; 41 TC 1) the character of a partial liquidating distribution under the law of Maryland was recognized as impairing the original capital so that it was as capital that the shares were received in respect of the spin-off (to use the phrase current in the United States) or hive-off. This result was arrived at despite the continued holding of an unchanged number of shares in the corporation effecting the spin-off. This seems surprising when it is considered that in a split-off the shareholder has to surrender part of his holding in consideration of the new off-shoot, a process carried to its logical conclusion in a split-up when the original holding is altogether replaced by the holdings exchanged. Applying the basic principle of the preservation of the corpus it may be observed that the spin-off impairs the original holding by a method in principle indistinguishable from any capital dividend – the difference is one of degree. The correct interpretation of the Rae v. Lazard case is that the law of the State to which the corporation in question owed its existence treated the spin-off as impugning the original capital. The UK Courts are prepared to treat as a question of fact (to be established before them by evidence) whether or not what happens to a foreign corporation is to be regarded as involving a distribution of capital rather than income.

European capital distribution

An instance of the application of this principle in a European context occurred in Courtaulds Investments Ltd v. Fleming (48 ATC 364). Briefly, the law of Italy permitted the distribution as capital of any share premium in excess of the requisite legal reserve proportionate to subscribed capital. Buckley, J, accepted this as lying outside the ambit of Case V of Schedule D and it is interesting to note that he reversed the determination of the Special Commissioners. It would appear that, although final arbiters of fact, the Special Commissioners are not immune from correction where they draw incorrect inferences as to the legal meaning of those facts.

A fountain-head of UK law on the character of company distributions is to be found in CIR v. John Blott (8 TC 101). Viscount Haldane referred to the powers given by statute to the members of a company with particular mention of increase of capital. Hence the company, acting in due form with the assent of its shareholders, can convert accumulated profits into capital. Such action is conclusive, even against a claim by the Revenue for tax presented on the footing that the profits transmuted have first been paid out as dividend – a claim ineffective because examination of the company's formal acts reveals that no dividend has been paid. The Blott principle remains valid when applied to the operations of foreign companies if the stock dividends (issued by United States companies) or other indicia of title are shown to be of the character of bonus shares (Lawson v. Rolfe [1969] TR 537).

Bearer shares and tax

In The Proposal for a European Company (supra) reference is made to the problem resulting from an Italian decree militating against the issue of bearer shares. It appears that the Italian authorities valued the opportunity for fiscal police measures which registered shares offer, but were under pressure to accord full acceptance to bearer shares in conformity with Community practice. It seems likely that similar pressures will be applied to the United Kingdom.

The categories of distribution other than dividends specified for UK resident companies by section 233 of the Taxes Act are manifold. It is provided that where, on a transfer of assets or liabilities by a company to its members or to a company by its members, the amount or value of the benefit received by a member (taken according to its market value) exceeds the amount or value (so taken) of any new consideration given by him, the company is to be treated as making a distribution to him of an amount equal to the difference. An exception exists for group companies, and the rule would appear inapplicable if the identity of members is unascertainable.

Operations ranking as distributions

Any distribution out of the assets of a company, whether in cash or otherwise, in respect of shares in the company ranks as a Schedule F distribution except to the extent that it represents a repayment of capital or reflects new consideration. Any excess over new consideration also attracts liability where redeemable share capital or any security in respect of shares is issued. For securities a Schedule F character is liable to be attached to the interest, premium or other excess over principal in a variety of circumstances. The yield on securities issued in right of shares (unless issued before April 6th, 1965) is wholly caught.

Securities convertible into shares are likewise affected unless they are quoted or issued on comparable terms. Indeed any yield in excess of a reasonable commercial return is transferred to Schedule F, as is all recompense dependent upon the company's results. Although special mention is made of the equity-linked security known to the initiated as a 'Siamese twin', it is not so much in relation to that and the foregoing categories that identification problems arise as in relation to overseas holdings. Section 233 (2) (d) (iv) of the Taxes Act is concerned with securities issued by a UK resident company and held by a non-resident company, where they are linked by a direct or indirect 75 per cent shareholding nexus. However, this portion of the 1970 consolidation measure is repealed and re-enacted by paragraph 6 in Schedule 4 to the Finance Act 1970. The new rule applies to any payment becoming due or paid in an accounting period which ends after April 5th, 1970.

The re-enactment refers to securities issued by the UK resident company and held by a non-resident company in three distinct sets of circumstances. The first is that where the UK company issuing the securities is a 75 per cent subsidiary of the company holding them; the second is that where both are 75 per cent subsidiaries of a third company which is not resident; the third assumes that both issuer and issuee are non-resident although 75 per cent subsidiaries of a UK resident. This last case is subject to an exception where at least 90 per cent of the share capital of the company issuing the securities is directly owned by a company resident in the UK.

Close companies

There are further rules in Part X of the Taxes Act for amplifying the foregoing rules, with particular reference to bonus issues following repayment of share capital. However, the main area in which the need to identify shareholders arises is in relation to close companies. Indeed it is not even possible to establish that a company is not close without a reasonable amount of information as to the dispersal of shareholdings. The principal exemption is given for a company of which the control (by reason of beneficial ownership of shares) is in the hands of a company which is not a close company, or several such companies, subject to satisfying the condition that it could only be treated as close by reference to being under the control of five or fewer participators but only if at least one of the participators thus selected is not a close company. In applying this test a company not resident in the UK (and thus not capable of being actually close) is reckoned as close if its residence status is the only factor precluding that status.

The second main exemption concerns a company of which shares (not preferred) carrying not less than 35 per cent of the voting power have been allotted unconditionally to, or acquired by, and are at that time beneficially held by the public, subject to the condition that any such shares have been the subject of dealings in the past twelve months on a recognized stock exchange where they were quoted. This exemption is, however, abrogated if over 85 per cent of the voting power is possessed by the principal members, that is, the conjunction of five members between them possessing the five greatest percentages of voting power (in excess of 5 per cent each), equally great holdings being aggregated as one unit.

There are many more provisions in Chapter III of Part XI of the Taxes Act 1970 which serve to elaborate and elucidate these basic criteria. It is apparent, however, that the existing taxation rules would be unworkable against a background of bearer shares. It is suggested that the solution might lie in identifying the close company with the proprietary company proposed in the accountancy bodies memorandum (supra) and it is none too soon for the Government to consider adapting the climate of business law to the conditions likely to prevail in the European Economic Community.

Books

The Company: Law, Structure and Reform in Eleven Countries

edited by CHARLES DE HOUGHTON.

Allen & Unwin, £5 5s.

This book has been produced under the auspices of Political and Economic Planning (PEP) as a contribution to the debate on the reforming of company law. The countries whose law is examined are Belgium, Britain, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Sweden and Yugoslavia; together with the United States, Japan and India. Each section has been contributed by an author representative of his country.

The book first defines the types of public and private enterprise existing in each country, then the objectives and priorities of the company are discussed, followed by an examination of the internal management, and the representation and protection of interests inside a company.

Appendices relate to the attitude to reform in various countries, including Belgium, France, Germany and Scotland, and the growth of the 'multinational' company.

The book's chief virtue for many readers will be as a reference work, though for students of sociology or comparative law it deserves to be read as a whole. Perhaps the real pity about a book which deals with reform is that so many of its readers will not bestir themselves overmuch in the formative stages; and when the reform becomes substantive, they find it is not always to their liking.

The Measurement of Capital Employed by G. J. PIERCE, F.C.W.A.

Business Books Limited, £2 10s.

During the past 20 years both in Britain and the USA, much has been said about the measurement of profit in relationship to capital employed but little of real value has been written. It was for this reason that The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants issued their Research publication on The Planning and Measurement of Profit.

Earlier this year a book entitled Working Capital, by Park and Gladson, appeared in which the interesting concept of linking the amount of capital invested to the time element was developed. It is this concept of linking time with capital invested that is the basis of the ideas presented by Mr G. J. Pierce in the book under review. Not only has he developed this concept, which he calls CAPTIM (capital on a time-basis) but he has carried out his ideas to the extent of providing a practical tool for management control.

In applying the principles of CAPTIM, the capital employed is recorded at frequent intervals, probably monthly, and related to the time of investment. As a result, the final figure of capital employed is value loaded by time employed. Worked examples are given demonstrating the method employed in various situations that might be met in industry.

The application of CAPTIM is used not only for the control of fixed assets but also for the many types of variable assets. In the case of the fixed assets some unusual proposals for valuation of CAPTIM are proposed. In respect of the variable assets, the method gives control over raw materials, component parts, work in progress, finished goods in the manufacturing side, as well as debtors, creditors and rates of payment in the administration side.

The author appreciated that to carry out the calculations required to give the degree of control envisaged it would be necessary to use some modern calculating equipment. He describes the type of computer required and the type of application which would be expected.

In writing this book, the author has made a considerable contribution to management techniques in a field where there is considerable need. The book is to be recommended to all accountants, both student and qualified, and it is not without interest to the practitioner in computer control.

Director's Guide to Management Techniques

edited by D. LOCK and G. TAVERNIER.

Gower Press, £6.

The first 280 pages of this book are devoted to thumb-nail sketches of twenty-one different management techniques. It is not without significance, perhaps, that all but five of these mini-articles are written by consultants or members of consulting firms. Since the average length of each article is little more than ten pages, description of the techniques is of necessity very superficial. For example, the twelve pages devoted to discounted cash-flow include one page of DCF tables, an explanation of what DCF is about, lease and buy decisions, company acquisitions, capital investment decisions, investment criteria and risk analysis.

In the section covering cost and value in pricing policy (seven pages), three very brief paragraphs are devoted to the vital consideration of the relationship of costs to the marketing strategy of the business, and no guidance is given as to the assessment of product performance, or to the very necessary managerial controls that are required if a marginal costing approach is adopted.

Part two of the book consists of a glossary of management terms. Some of the definitions are of doubtful validity. For example, 'Capital expenditure is the part of a company's negative cash-flow which an accountant can convert into tax-free income through the device of depreciation.' The definition of break-even point omits the most common use of this definition, i.e., in break-even analysis of revenue and costs, but deals with its use in the equivalent mean investment period system of project assessment. (The authors should also get their chapter reference correct for this item, particularly as there is no index.)

Part three is basically a register of consultants, with a note on how to select and use a management consultant by the secretary of the Management Consultants' Association. (This register does not show the accountancy firms who offer consultancy services, though such exclusion is not now obligatory.) The remainder of the book consists of a register of advisory bodies.

Introduction to Computers and Programming

by JESSICA HELLWIG.

Columbia University Press, 50s.

The scope of this book is wider and its worth as purely an introduction to terminology and basic hardware, more valuable than its general format would lead one to believe. The use of 'typewriter' type face and layout is not ideal for ease of reading and there are many occasions when the inflexibility of layout and type face confuses and conceals information. Moreover, had this volume been produced in a limp cover at a low price it would find easier acceptance among students and trainees.

But these criticisms are more than outweighed by the contribution which the book makes to the training tools in schools and colleges. Diagrams and illustrations are limited to those which can easily be produced within the limitations of the book's format. Of particular value are the exercises at the end of each chapter and the answers given at the back of the volume. It is a useful volume for self-teaching but, acceptably, at a purely introductory level.

Finance and Commerce

First Accounts

THE accounts of William Nuttall Transport, reprinted this week, are the first to be presented since the company's capital was marketed through a placing of the 5s shares at 14s 9d a share last January. The company represented the grouping of a number of haulage companies and as Mr Jim Wild, F.C.A., the chairman, says in his statement with the accounts, the structure of the group was initially untidy.

That was unavoidable because the acquisition of several branches could not be completed until the Stock Exchange quotation had been granted after publication of the placing details. But by the end of last March suitable management structure had been established and the number of trading subsidiaries reduced from 20 to 9, with the capital of each of the 9 reconstructed 'according to its status and needs'.

Mr Wild recalls that last January there were suggestions that the group was new, untried and without a history as a group working together. He admits that much to a degree but makes the point that the prior records of the constituent companies gave the group a fair start and co-ordination is proceeding satisfactorily.

Management and accounting techniques have been streamlined and Mr Wild says 'it has been possible to introduce specially designed management accounting procedures throughout the group' effective from the beginning of the current financial year.

Uniform procedure

Installation and application of uniform management accounting procedure over such a widespread group in such a relatively short space of time is no mean achievement. Subsidiaries are located at Glasgow, Edinburgh, Carlisle, Newcastle, Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, Birmingham, Bristol, and London, and the operating names, besides Nuttall, include Arthur Wood Transport, East Ham Haulage and James Galloway Transport. Co-ordination needed to be well planned and established.

But Mr Wild says that information now being provided will help management not only in relation to day-to-day matters but also in relation to the planned expansion of the services offered by the group. These steps, all the same, will not be hurried 'and will be carefully chosen to increase without endangering established profitability'.

The group's vehicles are largely concerned with long distance operations and Mr Wild reports that the fleet consists of 290 motor vehicles and 260 trailers. Although that means an increase of 30 vehicles and 57 trailers since January, the fleet remains under pressure to meet customer requirements.

Replacement costs and about one-third of the cost of additional vehicles have been provided from cash resources and the remaining two-thirds of the additions have been leased so that planned cash flow will not be adversely affected by this rather rapid fleet increase.

Depreciation

Depreciation policy is summarized in the notes to the accounts and Mr Wild comments on the setting up of a depreciation equalization reserve 'so that the charges against profits during the earlier months of leasing will not be lower than the charges which would have been made for depreciation had the vehicles been purchased'. He feels that this principle is important to the measurement of future profits.

There is no doubt, he considers, that many haulage companies have under-provided for fleet depreciation and as a result profits have fluctuated unnaturally and have been overstated. The William Nuttall depreciation formula 'has been introduced to ensure so far as possible that profits and asset valuations will not be overstated'.

At the end of its useful life each vehicle is sold on the open market and the group policy is to take advantage of trade discounts available for volume contracts for the purchase of new equipment. Vehicles sold in the past year realized more than their total book value calculated on the Nuttall formula.

Profits at £211,138 were £1,138 ahead of the prospectus forecast which Mr Wild says was firmly based on audited first-half figures. 'An appropriate reserve', he says, was built into the second-half forecast but an equal amount of profit was frustrated by the loss of turnover during a week of unofficial strike action by drivers at two branches.

Social responsibilities

The strikes following the legal reduction in the permitted maximum hours of work occurred at a time when rising living costs were causing concern. Mr Wild takes the view that some relaxation or the introduction of reasoned flexibility into this aspect of the new transport legislation is urgently necessary in the interests of the industry and of the men who operate it.

Looking ahead, Mr Wild inevitably sees a continuing increase in operating costs which will have to be offset as far as possible by increasingly efficient operating techniques and by intensive use of modern equipment. In the first quarter of the current year group turnover and profit figures were 'in accordance with budget which takes reasoned account of the programme of expansion which has been planned'.

Against the placing price of 14s 9d last January, William Nuttall shares currently stand at 11s 9d and Mr Wild comments on the losing battle that the stock-market has fought against international, economic and political uncertainties. The directors, he says, are 'conscious of their responsibilities to ensure a satisfactory investment to shareholders and provide secure employment to all employees'.

This column recently commented on the order in which reports should be presented. There is plenty of room for debate on this point but there would probably be general agreement that Mr Wild's statement to shareholders in William Nuttall is interesting as it appears in the wrong order. It appears between the accounts and the notes on the accounts and if there is no agreement on where the chairman's statement actually should appear, this column considers that the statement should not be placed between the notes and the accounts.

The accounts and notes, incidentally, are not 'keyed' which is a point that should be rectified next year.

Tax Weight

THE tax weight carried by the brewery industry is shown by Mr W. H. Whitbread, chairman of the Whitbread group. On turnover of £200 million in the past financial year, the group paid £50 million in duty on beer, £22 million in duty on wines and spirits, £5.5 million in corporation tax and a further £650,000 in selective employment tax, making a total of over £78 million.

Mr Whitbread reminds shareholders that during their period of office the Labour Government increased duty on beer three times, on spirits four times, and on wines five times. They also imposed SET and put the industry before the Monopolies Commission 'which after two-and-a-half years involving many of our directors, accountants and lawyers in intensive work, produced a nil report'.

In addition there have been two confrontations with the Prices and Incomes Board giving executives further work in order to produce the facts and figures required by the Board. Mr Whitbread looks forward 'to seeing the new Government carry out their promises to reduce taxation'.

Mr Whitbread wonders how long the present position of return on capital employed being lower than the cost of raising new money can last.

No to Mergers

COMMENTING on the vexed question of mergers, Mr J. H. B. Atley, chairman and joint managing director of the May & Hassell group of timber companies, refers to the massive amalgamations that have taken place within the timber trade and states that May & Hassell have had their fair share of preliminary proposals and tentative feelers. However, the directors, the chairman says, 'feel that at the present time we are well equipped to go it alone bearing in mind, of course, that from time to time it must be to our advantage to make smaller acquisitions'.

The future of the timber trade will probably be in the hands of seven or eight major groups and May & Hassell intend to be one of them. 'We are', Mr Atley says, 'in the very happy position of having many young men with us who have been properly trained with experience all over the world thus enabling continuity of management. Furthermore, they are now in a position to advise on the tremendous changes that are taking place in our timber trade'.

All the same, Mr Atley considers that not enough has yet been made of rationalization within the group. Since the acquisition of new companies, many thousands of pounds have been saved, but savings 'will be greater by further rationalization'.

Disappointment in Australia

ANOTHER well-known timber company, Montague L. Meyer, has been expanding in Australia as well as at home.

It seems, however, that the failure of acquired companies to match their pre-acquisition performance or to realize their acquisition-inspired potential is not entirely confined to the UK. Mr John Meyer, in his chairman's review with the 1969-70 accounts, has to report disappointment in Australia.

Half-year results of a company in which control was acquired early last year led to the belief that the business was running at a profit - 'but it became clear that a series of errors had been made in these and earlier accounts'. Steps taken to put things right were too late to prevent a loss being incurred for the full year.

But the group's keenness to become involved in the Australian merchanting trade is apparently in no way diminished and the directors 'look forward to having a successful enterprise there in the future'.

The timber trade in the UK, incidentally, has been one of the heaviest sufferers from the effect of import deposits. Meyer, with £1,500,000 still on deposit, naturally looks forward to the withdrawal of the deposits from next December.

Expanding Overseas

NOTLEY & Pearson, Chartered Accountants, of Newport, Mon., have resigned as auditors of L. Ryan Holdings Ltd because of the expanding overseas nature of the group's activities. Mr L. Ryan says that the board has accepted the resignation with 'considerable regret, and has placed on record its appreciation of the considerable help received from Messrs Notley & Pearson over a long period of years since the business was first established'.

Deloitte, Plender, Griffiths & Co, already acting for the L. Ryan group in Belgium, have been appointed auditors to the company.

L. Ryan's main business is coal reclamation from spoil tips and the sale of the coal to electricity power stations. The main operating area is South Wales, but considerable progress has been made with a project in Belgium, and the first coal washing-screening plant came into production last April. A second is expected to be operating in October, and a third and fourth by the end of next January.

Development in Belgium is through a joint company - Ryan Europe SA - a Belgian registered company owned equally by L. Ryan Holdings and Evence Coppee et Compagnie. The policy is to extend the coal recovery operation on the Continent, and preliminary work has already been carried out with a view to extending the operation to other suitable Continental countries.

CITY NOTES

OPENING of the great talking season – the TUC conference, the World Bank and International Monetary Fund meetings, and the political party conferences – marks the end of the summer lull and the gathering of the clouds before the winter storms.

That there will be storms economic and industrial this winter there seems little doubt. That there will be autumn 'measures', as distinct from an autumn Budget, there seems little doubt either.

It looks, however, as though financial markets will have to suffer all the talking before they see any action. In the interim they will have to take some strain.

Sterling in the foreign exchange market has been allowed to take the strain imposed on it by limited offering, and the rate against the dollar has been allowed to run down well below what used to be considered the essential support level.

That there is some strain on sterling is hardly surprising under present circumstances. It is not particularly difficult to think of currencies better to hold.

Letting the rate take the weight, however, imposes less of a strain on the reserves and may even ease the pressure itself to some degree.

In the stock-markets there is barely enough business to impose strain anywhere, except on stockbroking finances.

IMPROVED liquidity recently seen in the US banking system is a 'small but very important beginning' in the rebuilding of overall liquidity in the economy, according to the First National Bank of Chicago's latest Bond and Money Market Review. Noting that a revival in investor confidence is evident in the success of recent large financings, the review points out that subscriptions for a recent US Treasury 18-month note, yielding 7.45 per cent, were a 'huge success' resulting in an allotment ratio of only 9½ per cent.

The ability of the market to absorb heavy corporate as well as Treasury flotations 'suggests a decidedly improved state of affairs'. The improving liquidity of the US banking system is ascribed to the long overdue relaxation of interest rate restrictions which has allowed the banks to become more competitive in the domestic money markets.

* * * *

ON this side of the Atlantic, the mid-August figures from the clearing banks indicated that although the rate of increase in bank lending to the restricted private sector has noticeably slackened compared with the June-July experience, there is still an underlying increase.

At a time when the Government is being urged to attempt to inject growth into the economy, the banks remain under a tight lending directive. They were sharply reminded of that directive just over a month ago.

IN IOS, to coin the obvious phrase, there is never a dull moment. Those whose job it is to keep abreast of the IOS situation are apt to get terribly out of touch if they take even a day off. Basically, the IOS search is for what the cynics term 'respectability' and what in other circles might be called credibility.

But in an essentially international organization, the ingredients of respectability or credibility differ. The names of highly respected London merchant banks may not necessarily do the confidence job in far away places. In the same way, American names are received with certain reserve here. IOS is almost suffering from a surfeit of names now.

Even given the bolstering of its finances, it seems doubtful whether the IOS ego can be similarly restored. If the finances and funds are preserved, that will be something. For IOS to start selling in its old style would be very much something else.

Letters

The Future of the Profession

SIR, - I have read with interest the letters relating to the above subject appearing in the issue of The Accountant dated August 20th.

Prior to learning the intentions of the Councils of the various bodies involved in the integration scheme I should like to make some comment on the letters submitted by Messrs Eden, Bailey and Pearce.

Mr Eden suggests as a 'second alternative' that a merger of the ACCA, ICWA and IMTA would be representative of industry, commerce and public service. Mr Bailey suggests a merger of the ACCA and ICWA.

If either of the above mergers were to take place what would be the position of the 'professionally qualified' certified accountant in public practice? In a new enlarged body consisting of ACCA, ICWA and/or IMTA I do not feel that the interests of the minority group of certified accountants in public practice could be adequately protected and am therefore in agreement with Mr Pearce that there be a possible absorption of such a minority group by the three chartered institutes.

Notification of the intentions of the various Councils is awaited with interest.

Yours faithfully,

JAMES CURREN, A.A.C.C.A., A.M.B.I.M.

Hamilton, Bermuda.

SIR, - Whilst away on holiday I was appalled to read the result of the Institute's proxy vote on amalgamation. On my return I was even more disturbed to see how so many of your correspondents seem to accept the result - and many with satisfaction.

The accountancy profession, which has suffered a very poor public image for so many years, did look as if it was at last about to lift itself into the twentieth century. And then this! We, who are supposed to advise and execute the rationalization of British industry with all the necessary mergers and take-overs, cannot, when the matter relates to our own profession, see further than the end of our haughty noses. Surely neither the business world nor our fellow accountancy bodies will ever again take the ICA seriously. For a decade at least we must become the laughing stock of all intelligent people.

After this fiasco, how any more can I claim, with pride, that I am a chartered accountant. If it were not that I must keep my qualification in order to retain my position, the secretary would already have received my resignation for I no longer wish to be identified with an Institute whose members have their heads buried so deeply in the sand, or should I say - so high in the clouds. My subscription must continue to be paid but my support must wither. In the meantime, the members of the Council whose vision and enterprise brought us so close to a new era, have my heartfelt sympathy.

May I implore the Institute Council to consider seriously whether there are any ways in which we can have second thoughts. It was done by the Scottish Institute on this very subject and our own organization reversed its ideas fairly recently on the matter of free publications. If it is not too late and a pressure group is needed to try to undo the untold damage which so many misguided and short-sighted members of the ICA have done to the accountancy profession as a whole, I will gladly do what I can.

Finally, may I say that I have not bothered to include once again the arguments why integration was so necessary. You kindly printed these in a previous letter from me in 1967.

Yours faithfully,

A. J. ADAMS, A.C.A.

Grappenhall, near Warrington, Lancs.

SIR, - As a result of the Institute's integration scheme voting, it has now become finally clear there must be more than one main body of accountants in Great Britain.

This, however, could be resolved into two bodies if all the other bodies, namely, IMTA, ICWA, and BFI bodies - Faculty, British, and International - were to be absorbed into the Certified body on an equal membership basis, and all three Institutes - English, Scottish and Irish - were united into one Institute.

Alternatively, a national body of accountants formed to take in all the above nine bodies and other bodies which could be subdivided if considered necessary into:

- (a) Accountants in public practice.
- (b) Accountants in commerce and industry.

Yours faithfully,

Newcastle 3.

J. C. FISHER.

SIR, - Now that the integration proposals have been rejected by the English Institute, I would like the Council of that Institute to consider the advisability of relaxing its examination regulations concerning members of other bodies which participated in the scheme as follows:

- A (i) Exempting members of the ACCA from its examinations and requiring those who did not serve articles to do so with its members only as a condition of admission to membership (three-year articles);
- (ii) admitting to membership all practising members of the ACCA and those who had served articles; or
- (iii) requiring ACCA members falling within (i) and (ii) above to sit its examination in Auditing and Investigations only before admission to the Institute's membership.
- B (i) Requiring members of the ICWA to serve articles for three years and pass the Institute's examination in Auditing and Investigations, Taxation and the papers on Advanced Accounting and English Law which include Executorship and Bankruptcy.

If its regulations are relaxed in this way, most members of the ACCA and ICWA will also be members of the Institute. The Institute will gain a lot, I believe, by having these 'technical men' in its membership.

The three Chartered Institutes, by forming a Joint

Diploma Board with the ACCA and ICWA and establishing a post-qualification diploma for members of the five bodies, have apparently admitted that these non-chartered bodies are of equivalent status with them. There is, therefore, no reason why members of ACCA and ICWA should not be exempted from the Institute's examinations as recommended above if they want membership of the Institutes as well.

I was shocked when I perused the Institute's regulations to notice that no provision is made for other qualified accountants who may wish to join the Institute (unlike the ACCA and ICWA) and yet the Institute form allies with these other bodies.

If the regulations of the three chartered institutes could not be relaxed in this way, I would call on the ACCA and ICWA to opt out of the Joint Diploma Board and form their own board and ensure a complete split of the accountancy profession.

Yours sincerely,

Lagos, Nigeria.

E. I. JOHN.

SIR, - As an expatriate accountant I am, I suspect, like many of my colleagues who work in industry and commerce throughout the world, seriously disturbed by the result of the English Institute's poll on the integration of the accountancy profession.

Being resident in the EEC and looking somewhat detachedly at the English accountancy profession, I am certain that the myopic vested interests of the practising chartered accountant have missed an excellent opportunity for leadership and development of the accounting profession, not only in the UK but in Europe as a whole.

At least the Dutch, whose financial and commercial acumen is recognized throughout the world, have not fallen into the same trap and have unified their profession to speak with one voice - which makes it all the more regrettable that the largest organized accountancy body in the UK could not have done likewise.

As the vested practising interests seem to concern themselves so little with the development of the profession as a whole, there is no alternative but to form a merged body of the Association, the Institute of Cost and Works and the Municipal Treasurers to represent industry, commerce and public services. This body would then be large enough to speak with one voice to its European associates when Europe eventually integrates its legal, tax and accounting practices.

Yours faithfully,

Antwerp, Belgium. BRIAN D. LOOSLEY, A.A.C.C.A.

Salaries in the Profession

SIR, - Having read the two letters published in your columns (August 13th and 20th issues) criticizing our report 'Salaries in the Profession', it is worth noting that the variances mentioned between salaries achieved through our competitors and those achieved through ourselves, are so small as to be insignificant.

Reaction to the report received to date has been very favourable, and indeed many of our clients have expressed agreement with our findings and requested that they be included on all future mailing lists.

The report was compiled in an honest attempt to provide a guide to staff partners, and whilst figures quoted in that report reflect salary scales from articles to qualification, we noticed that the highest scale in each section has been criticized, and that the criticism has been levelled by those who have not read our report but only the brief synopsis published in your columns (August 6th issue) and the columns of the national press.

We welcome informed criticism but mention that our competitors' criticism is ill-informed, and we in turn are rather surprised that they were so hasty in putting pen to paper in such a manner.

Vive la difference.

Yours sincerely,

DAMIEN F. McQUILLAN,

Managing Director,

Source and Application of Funds

SIR, - The article for students entitled 'Source and application of funds' (July 30th issue) explained the appearance of depreciation as a source of funds with the phrase: 'Just as the acquisition of the asset was reflected in the statement as an application of funds, so must its shrinkage in value by depreciation be reflected as a source of funds.' In fact the appearance of depreciation as a source is purely the result of the convenient short-cut method of using the profit before taxation as a source of funds rather than listing all the receipts and payments which have been used to calculate that figure. Depreciation must therefore be added back in the funds statement because it is a financial charge not affecting cash.

Furthermore, one must consider that, in the funds statement, the whole purchase price of an asset is shown as an application of funds in the year of purchase whereas in the profits statement it is spread over a number of years by means of the depreciation charge; depreciation must therefore be added back to avoid a double counting of capital expenditure.

Whilst this accepted layout of funds statements is convenient in that it is composed of figures which can be directly related to the profits statement and balance sheets, there is a danger that non-accountants reading such statements may be misled by a too literal acceptance of them. For example, there can be no doubt that many people are under the false impression that depreciation is quite definitely a source of funds for assets replacement. This in turn can lead to the erroneous conclusion that, where capital expenditure does not exceed depreciation, expansion is being financed out of profits.

Perhaps it is high time that accounts everywhere made it quite clear once and for all that the depreciation charge does not purport to be a measure or provision of any sort, but is merely the apportionment of the historic cost of an asset, bearing no relationship whatsoever to current prices or replacement values.

Yours sincerely,

London SE25.

Best Practice?

SIR, - I would welcome readers' comments on the desirability (or otherwise) of including an overdraft in the balance sheet of a company at 'the figure as shown on the bank statement'. I recently saw this, as a 'note on the accounts'.

Yours faithfully,

Brighton.

Desk-top Folding Machine

A NEW desk-top folding machine which will fold, perforate and stack automatically is now available from Pitney-Bowes, and is suitable for all offices, large or small.

Simple to operate, the Model 1835 handles a wide range of paper sizes and thicknesses. Easy adjustments allow the operator to set the machine to cope with any of the most commonly used folds, while its straight-line paper flow enables inexperienced operators to produce first-class results. A two-speed control button will vary the performance of the machine to cope with various document sizes and weights.

The Model 1835 is particularly suitable for folding letters, circulars, invoices and statements, and optional extras include an item counter and a reverse stacker which permits stacking of folded documents in reverse order to attain proper sequence.

Low-priced Adding Machines

CLAIMED to be America's top selling decimal electric adding machines, the Addmaster 7/8H and 10/10 have been launched in the United Kingdom this month by the Addmaster Corporation (UK) Ltd.

Designed for general office work, the machines are equipped as portable carrying units weighing under 9 lb. and measuring only 13 in. long by 8 in. wide. They add, subtract, subtotal, total and multiply, and the 7/8 model prints in amounts of up to a 'half p' under £100,000 and prints out a total up to a 'half p' under £1 million. This capacity can be increased by using the two pence column for pounds on large number transactions, although in this case the high capacity 10/10 machine might be needed as it prints and totals amounts up to one penny under £100,000,000.

The standard Addmaster 7/8H is priced £42 10s and the high capacity 10/10 model at £45 10s.

Small Clients – Profitable Clients?

SAFEGUARD BUSINESS SYSTEMS of Stoke-on-Trent have recently introduced a completely new accounting system specially designed to turn small clients into profitable clients. The system, called 'Safex', enables the client to have full day-to-day control of income and expenditure and to report to his accountant clear and accurate information on a simple standardized form from which audit clerks can work quickly and easily.

The forms are, in fact, facsimile copies of expenditure cheques drawn by the client and can be conveniently filed in readily titled loose-leaf folders. This allows clients' papers to be assembled cumulatively and detail work spread throughout the year. Often this means that the accountant can pick up early warning signals and advise his client accordingly.

Safex is naturally not purporting to be the solution to all clients' problems but its promoters hold the view that it goes a long way towards holding back rising costs and maintaining a profit element in fees charged.

'Invisible' Self-adhesive Tape

AN 'INVISIBLE' self-adhesive tape, Aerotape, with a non-reflective matt finish, has been marketed by Ofrex Ltd. Opaque on the reel, it becomes almost impossible to detect when stuck to almost any surface – whether black and white or coloured.

Designed for holding, splicing and repair, it is tough, moisture-resistant and 'moulds' smoothly following the shape of the object to which it adheres. It is available in rolls $\frac{3}{4}$ in. by 36 yards, at 9s 4d per roll, with discounts on quantity, and a dispenser, which normally sells at 23s 3d, is being supplied free by Ofrex Ltd as an introductory offer with each six-roll order.

Multiple and Single Count Tallies

STORES INVENTORIES, catering records and counting live-stock are examples of the types of multiple recording for which the ENM 448 Multiple Hand Tally is suitable. It has been redesigned in an attractive plastic case and is available in banks of two, three, four, five or six units and ranges in price from £5 for a two-bank tally, to £15 for six banks.

Where single counting is required, the ENM Hand/Desk Tally can be used. It is operated by depressing a plunger to count, and if required, returning to zero by rotating the reset knob. This model is priced £2.

Electric Letter Opener

FOR COMPANIES receiving large quantities of mail which must be opened before being distributed, often a mammoth task, the Pitney-Bowes Model LA letter opener provides an excellent answer as it is a desk-top, electrically powered model, extremely fast and completely safe and easy to operate. It feeds, opens and neatly stacks mail many times faster than manual methods of opening.

Mail of varying sizes and thicknesses can be dealt with and the machine carefully trims off fine slices ensuring that important letters and valuable contents are not damaged. The thickness of cut is adjustable to suit various requirements, and the opener's angled feed plate, feed rollers and special stacker provide smooth but fast operation. Envelopes placed on to the feeder are automatically separated as they pass quickly through the machine to be neatly ejected into a stacking hopper; a disposal container is used for the unwanted trimmings.

Power Filing

IN AN environment of paper – and this is certainly the case in modern professional and industrial life – filing is all important. Untidy offices not only make file retrieval more difficult, but they increase the possibility of documents being lost thus inducing an atmosphere of frustration for principals and staff.

A solution to the problem is in Autoscan Power Filing System which keeps files tidy and automatically presented at the same level. Fewer staff are required, less space is occupied and there is greater security.

The system is very flexible in that it is simply a continuous chain of carriers enclosed in a cabinet. Each carrier has a number, and when the number button is pressed the chain is set in motion and the correct carrier presented in front of the cabinet. There is thus a considerable saving in file retrieval time.

Three basic principles guide Autoscan power filing: low profile, high profile single loop, and multi-loop. The low profile principle is exemplified by a short chain of carriers built into a low-level cabinet which is ideal for a small- or medium-sized office using a large number of files. With a high profile single loop model there is a longer chain which can extend to the ceiling height of one floor, or through several floors, and has the advantage of enabling a large number of files to be maintained within a small amount of floor space.

The multi-loop is a variable system for large companies, local authorities, corporations and government departments: it can be in vertical or horizontal form, or even a mixture of both, and may be adapted to 'waste areas' such as basements, lift shafts and light wells, or added to existing buildings with access through a wall.

Cost of installation will naturally depend upon the system required and consultations may be arranged with Autoscan Ltd, 19 Fitzroy Square, London W1.

STUDENT ROUNDBOUT

Birmingham's Second Business Game

Seventeen Teams Compete for Trophy

EVER since they won outright the first National Business Game held in 1968, The Birmingham Chartered Accountant Students' Society has shown a keen interest in computerized business games.

The Society was the first to organize a business game at a local level last year, and last Friday and Saturday saw the second Birmingham Business Game, held in conjunction with International Computers Ltd at the Imperial Centre Hotel, Birmingham.

A total of 17 teams of about five 'directors' each, representing Birmingham firms of chartered accountants, assembled in a vast 'boardroom' at 9 a.m. on Friday morning. A further dummy team was entered by Mr Bryan de Robeck, of ICL, in order to make up the required number of teams. This company unintentionally nearly won its way into the semi-finals to be played on the Saturday morning!

Each company had to manufacture and market an unspecified consumer product with the object of achieving the maximum profitability over five periods - each representing a three-month time lap. At the end of each period the companies had to make various decisions, allocating cash to production to meet anticipated demand in each of four selling areas, as well as to transport and research and development. In addition, they also had to allocate cash to marketing to enable them to sell the product, which initially had a selling price of £40, but which could be varied as the company wished.

The decisions were then processed at the Baric Computer Bureau and a statement was produced giving a total market analysis, together with a comprehensive report on the performance of each individual company.

Nine teams fought their way into the semi-finals on the Saturday morning. An air of topicality was introduced into this day's play - the companies being told that they were manufacturing an engineering component to be used for making motor-cars. However, for the purposes of the game, the GKN-Sankey dispute remained unsettled until the fourth period, whilst the Government was giving grants for expenditure on research and development. The market was very sensitive – a factor which the teams had to deduce from the current conditions. These 'difficulty' factors had been fed into the computer and the companies had the far from easy task of making their decisions accordingly.

By the afternoon only three teams were left for the finals. During this stage of the game, the three companies were manufacturing an engineering component for the oil industry; there had been a Middle East assassination, the Palestine Liberation Force was in control in Amman, and consequently the market was once again very sensitive. All the companies started with a severe cash shortage and an £880,000 loss. In the second period, the market hardened as financial conditions became more stable.

The game finally concluded late in the afternoon and at 6 p.m. the President of the Society, Mr Graham Withnall, F.C.A., presented the Birmingham Business Game Shield to the winning team: Gerald Hill, Peter Naylor, Clive Brooks, Mike Paddock, and Bob Harley.

On the preceding evening an informal dinner was held at the Conservative Club, prior to which there was a reception for 'managing directors', adjudicators and administrators given by the Society's President.

'SPECIALIST' COURSES IN LONDON

The first of two 'specialist' two-day courses for members of The Chartered Accountant Students' Society of London takes place on Thursday and Friday, September 24th and 25th.

Entitled 'Finance and economics', the course has been arranged by the British Petroleum Co and will be held at the company's conference centre, Britannic House, Moor Lane, London EC2, where senior members of the company will give addresses on the international aspects of accounting within BP, with particular reference to finance, taxation and auditing. The commercial uses of computers within the oil industry and budgetary control will also be dealt with and there will be a film showing oil operators in Alaska.

The second course will be on corporation tax and taxation of capital gains and will be held on Thursday and Friday, October 8th and 9th, at the Chartered Insurance Institute, 20 Aldermanbury, London EC2.

Arranged by H. Foulks Lynch & Co, it will cover such subjects as computation of company losses, short-term and long-term gains, close companies, short-falls, treatment of gifts and the interaction of capital gains tax and estate duty. The first day will conclude with a mock appeal against a short-fall assessment and a similar interview on the second day will help members to learn how the necessary information is used to calculate chargeable gains. Speakers will be Mr L. J. Northcott, F.C.A., Miss F. V. Slade, F.C.A., and Mr P. R. Swinnerton, A.C.A.

Applications to attend either course, together with course fee of £3 3s, should be sent without delay to the secretary of the Society, 43 London Wall, London EC2.

BRADFORD PRINCIPALS WIN MATCH

THE only redeeming feature in a cricket match played between members of The Bradford and District Chartered Accountant Students' Society and principals on August 19th was, so far as the students were concerned, the fine wicket-keeping by Mick Atkinson and the splendid fielding of Brian Pettinger which saved a number of runs.

The match had to be restricted to 20 overs per side due to bad light. The principals, aided by David Kraus (20), scored 83 runs, whilst the students mustered 36 from 15 overs, Roger Parson taking three wickets for three runs from three overs. The students, it should be added, fielded a much weakened side.

Dance at Penny Farthing Club

As already announced under 'Roundabout', the Society is holding a dance at the Penny Farthing Club, Bradford, on September 28th, from 8 p.m. to 2 a.m.

Admission is 4s and included in this price is one year's membership of the club. Tickets are available from any committee member and John Brearton, of Claridge Turner & Co, Bradford, will gladly supply anyone who can sell tickets.

BOURNEMOUTH MEETINGS

THE first meeting in the 1970-71 session of the Bournemouth and District Chartered Accountant Students' Society was held this week when a speaker from Kalamazoo Ltd gave an enlightening talk to members on 'Decimalization – the accounting change-over and its problems'.

On September 23rd, there is to be a talk on 'Agency', by Mr M. R. Baker, and on October 7th, Mr C. H. Mead, F.C.A., will be speaking on 'The balance sheet audit'. Both these lectures will take place at the South Western Hotel, commencing at 4.30 p.m.

An interesting event in the Society's social calendar is an inter-office quiz to be held on Tuesday evening, September 29th, also at the South Western Hotel.

OBITUARY

Professor Roy Sidebotham

AN APPRECIATION

by Professor Edward Stamp, University of Edinburgh

Academic and practising accountants throughout the English-speaking world will have been shocked and saddened at the news in last week's issue of the death in Wellington, New Zealand, of Professor Roy Sidebotham, B.A. (COM.), F.C.A.N.Z., F.A.C.C.A., A.I.M.T.A., J.DIP.M.A., A.C.I.S.

Roy Sidebotham was only 43 when he died. Yet, at an age when many men have scarcely begun to hit their stride, he had set a pace which few others could hope to match. Born and educated in Manchester, he was for several years a lecturer at Manchester University and played an active part in accounting affairs in the UK. He was one of the small band who helped to put life into the Association of University Teachers of Accounting.

From the moment of his arrival in New Zealand in 1961 to take up the first Chair in Accountancy in the Victoria University of Wellington, he was a positive and dynamic catalyst within the academic and professional accounting communities, and he also took a leading part in church affairs. He was a great exponent of the dictum, 'Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might', and Roy Sidebotham put his hand to a great many tasks in the nine years of his life that he gave to New Zealand.

I joined him in his department at Wellington early in 1963, and we were colleagues until I left to come to Edinburgh three years ago. Roy had a great talent for academic administration and he built up a department at Wellington which is now one of the largest in the world. During his first tenure of office as Dean of the Faculty of Commerce he was the main driving force behind the complete redesign of the Faculty degree structure. Among many innovations the new Bachelor's degree makes the study of economics, politics, and mathematics and statistics, compulsory for all undergraduates reading accountancy.

It was typical of Roy that although he was not mathematically oriented himself he gave his full support to those of us who wanted to make the study of mathematics and statistics compulsory. We ended up with a course in which the New Zealand equivalent of 'A level' mathematics was a prerequisite. In this, as in so many other endeavours, his support and enthusiasm and leadership were decisive factors in securing changes which have been of great benefit to accountancy in New Zealand.

It would be idle to pretend that Roy's activities did not arouse opposition. There were a number of people in the universities, and in the New Zealand Society of Accountants, who disagreed with many of his ideas. I spent many hours arguing with him myself, both in private and on university and professional committees. At times our arguments were bitter. But I always knew that he was guided by what he thought was good for the profession, the university, and the department. And he was never a man to bear a grudge. This, combined with a puckish and altogether delightful sense of humour, won him a host of friends.

I asked him, just a few months ago, if he would be interested in coming back to Britain, a land of which he was very proud. He replied that he had no wish to do so and that he now looked on New Zealand as home. New Zealanders will be proud that he felt this way, grateful for the many contributions that he made in so many areas, and very sad that he has been taken from us so soon.

NEW DIRECTOR OF OXFORD CENTRE

The appointment of Professor R. I. Tricker, F.C.A., F.C.W.A., J.DIP.M.A., as Director of the Oxford Centre for Management Studies has now been confirmed and he will assume his duties fully on January 1st.

Professor Tricker has held the Barclays Bank Chair in Management Information Systems at the University of Warwick since 1968. He was previously a P. D. Leake Research Fellow of the Oxford Centre for two years following his return from the Harvard Business School.

He has written widely on accountancy and management matters, including articles for The Accountant. His is the only chair in management information systems in the country and he has lectured throughout Europe in this new field.

The second seminar, to be held on October 16th, will deal with 'Audit of customer accounting', 'Auditing and contract administration', and 'Practical aspects of fraud prevention'. Ample time will be provided for discussion at each lecture and time will be allotted at the end of the seminars for questions and general discussion.

The charge for each seminar, which includes buffet lunch and refreshments, is £2; or £3 for those who book for both. Those wishing to attend should write to Mr R. H. Pitchford, West Midlands Gas Board, Wharf Lane, Solihull, Birmingham.

A Need of Gratitude

A legacy for the Methodist Homes for the Aged is a means many generous people adopt in expressing gratitude for their own home and for serenity and peace-of-mind in their old age.

There are so many who are less fortunate and for lonely and anxious old people the Methodist Homes for the Aged are a haven and a home. Our constantly growing income from legacies, more than any other factor, has enabled us to embark on the capital expenditure for twenty-eight Homes. Unfortunately even these will accommodate only a few of the hundreds of deserving people on the tragically long waiting list.

We thankfully acknowledge this valuable assistance and ask you please to remember the Methodist Homes for the Aged when advising your clients.

PUBLISHERS OF THE ACCOUNTANT

151 STRAND, LONDON WC2R 1JJ

As Reviewed in The Industrial Society

The most obvious gap on the bookshelf of the training manager, and indeed anybody connected with training in industry, has been for a sound and authoritative introduction to the costing of training. Moreover, this is the subject which is producing perhaps the biggest problems in modern training, and yet the subject which has been least well covered both in courses and seminars, and in print.

The appearance of any book on the subject would be welcome, but Douglas Garbutt's contribution must be greeted with all the enthusiasm that can be mustered because it is so good.

Beginning with a masterly summation of the development and workings of the Industrial Training Act, and the cost implications present in the levy/grant system – one of the best available in print – he goes on to explain how a training budget can be arrived at, and what information is necessary to enable training costs to be controlled on a day-to-day basis. All this is done with the utmost clarity and good sense. He then develops his approach into the fields of evaluating and validating training and the cost effectiveness of training, before covering the role of cost accounting in developing training policy and planning training development.

These are areas where most training organisations are lacking – not surprisingly, perhaps, because of the lack of guidance hitherto available – but they are areas which must be developed if training people are finally to achieve the professionalism that so many are striving for.

This book is essential reading for everybody engaged in training, for personnel managers, for line managers, for finance men. All students of personnel management will find this an invaluable work. If what is taught in this book is absorbed and put into practice, Douglas Garbutt will have made one of the most vital contributions to the development of training in recent years. It is, however, shameful that this work has been left to an individual to develop. Certainly there should be some red faces in the Industrial Training Boards, and the Central Training Council, that this has not been their contribution.

Why are good accountants always at a premium?

Perhaps because really outstanding men in any professional sphere are devilish hard to discover. And much valued when they are found. Perhaps, too, because good accountants need to know so much about so many things.

Take life assurance for example: when an accountant needs to find a good contract for a client, he naturally seeks out the most competitive rate. Assuming that other aspects of the policy are equally suitable.

At this point, we can offer a little help. When the accountant is looking for a first class self-employed pension annuity, for instance, or a 10-year investment policy with a 15.3% equivalent gross yield, or a highly-competitive term assurance, he does not have to go on leafing doggedly through his reference books.

All he need do is put in a call to the U.K. Provident.

Something you don't expect from a merchant bank!

And we don't, of course, provide them.

We have other ways of helping a company to cope with a small budget.

Other techniques for stimulating business.

Like providing venture capital at the right time to stimulate growth.

And information at the right time to help new business ventures.

And investment experience to help resources to grow.

And knowledge of the whole field of international finance.

But any good merchant bank provides these services.

What other incentives do Kleinwort offer?

If there's one thing that distinguishes us from our competitors, it's the personal stamp we put on all our services.

We believe that you can't really know a merchant bank till a merchant bank knows you.

So ring or write to us for a personal chat about the various services we provide. Find out the kind of people we are.

Even if you decide that our special brand of experience can't immediately help your business, at least we can clear up a few misunderstandings about merchant banks.

At Kleinwort Benson we think that's the least you should expect from a merchant banker.

The Way Ahead

FOLLOWING the collapse of the integration scheme last month, the question most frequently asked by accountants – both in our columns and elsewhere – has been 'Where do we go from here?' In an address to members of the Institute of Internal Auditors last week, the President of the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, Mr C. Croxton-Smith, M.A., LL.B., F.C.A., put forward some of the answers.

It has been common knowledge for some time past that, irrespective of the outcome of the integration proposals, the English Institute intended to raise the minimum entry standard for prospective chartered accountants to a level comparable at least with university entrance requirements. (This was, in fact, the position prior to the Education Act 1944, since when it has been alleged that the present minimum of five 'O' levels represents a standard significantly lower than that of five credits in the pre-war School Certificate.) Mr Croxton-Smith made plain both his own preference for an all-graduate entry in due course, and his doubts of the ability of some 'O' level candidates to meet the standard at which the professional examinations are now necessarily set.

As noted in The Accountant for April 23rd, the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland is also working progressively towards an all-graduate entry, and it is earnestly to be hoped that this combined approach will enable accountancy to compete more effectively with other professions for which a university degree is already recognized as the minimum entry standard.

Particular significance will be attached to the President's exposition of the position and functions of the Accounting Standards Steering Committee. The force of previous accounting recommendations, except to the extent that they may have been subsequently enshrined in legislation, has been persuasive only, so that to depart from them was not regarded in itself as a matter for censure. It is now clear that this freedom to differ has not always best served the public interest; and once the new standards have been debated as exposure drafts and subsequently finalized and ratified by Council, members departing from them may be called on to justify their views, if necessary before the Disciplinary Committee.

This is at once a powerful sanction and a material departure from precedent, and there can be no doubt that a public statement of such far-reaching import by the President must also have the assurance of substantial support within the Council. The immediate outcome is likely to be a lively debate on future exposure drafts, followed in the longer term by increased public confidence in published accounts and in the standards of the profession – which has, it would be idle to deny, been badly shaken by some recent events.

The English Institute will also pursue its plans for a two-tier qualification structure. With the exacting standards which are increasingly required of chartered accountants, there is a great amount of useful work to be done at the technician level in all branches of the profession; and there are conspicuous advantages to the public, to the profession and to the candidates themselves in finding them a place within the Institute's training and ethical requirements, with the opportunity for subsequent progression to the upper tier.

We recorded in these columns on August 20th the view that the failure of the integration scheme had nevertheless left a legacy of solid achievement. Mr Croxton-Smith's speech, reproduced elsewhere in this issue, is the first major and authoritative expression of policy to emerge since chartered accountants opted to retain their separate identity.

REVENUE PRACTICE STATEMENT

Estate Duty: Discretionary Trusts

THE Board of Inland Revenue have had representations that trustees and their professional advisers are uncertain about the kind of records that trustees will need to maintain in the light of the legislation imposing a charge on discretionary trusts (sections 36 and 37, Finance Act 1969 as amended by section 31, Finance Act 1970). A statement has therefore been issued indicating the practice of the Estate Duty Office in relation to some aspects of the legislation which affect the matter.

Broadly, estate duty is payable on the death of a beneficiary under a discretionary trust on the same proportion of the trust property as the proportion that the deceased received of the trust income arising during a specified period of up to seven years (the 'relevant period' as defined in section 37, running to the date of death, or the date of advance out of the settled funds etc).

In the context, 'income' is considered to be income determined on ordinary trust principles. It is not, e.g., income as ascertained for income tax purposes. The Revenue view is that it is income net of income tax which the trustees are liable to pay, and net of any income which trustees must properly retain as a provision against future or contingent liabilities falling upon income, such as surtax which is levied on the settlor and which he can reclaim from the trustees.

Under section 36 (6) (d), Finance Act 1969, costs, expenses and fees properly payable out of income are to be deducted from the income. They are considered to be payable at the time when they become due and payable even if they are not in fact paid until later.

The term 'arising' (during the relevant period) is considered, in the case of income consisting of dividends, interest, rent, etc., to mean 'received by the trustees'. This means that neither dividends nor other income received in respect of a period spanning the beginning or end of a relevant period need be apportioned. In some cases, e.g., an unincorporated business or a landed estate, it will be sufficient to use the normal periodical accounts of the business or estate; income for broken periods at the beginning and end of the relevant period may be estimated by a time apportionment or such other method as seems reasonable in the particular circumstances.

Section 37 (3) (b), Finance Act 1969, provides the test for deciding once and for all whether, and to what extent, a payment made to a discretionary beneficiary is a payment of income or capital. If it is an income payment it may become part of the numerator of the fraction which determines how much of the trust fund is dutiable on his death. If it is a capital payment and was made after April 15th, 1969, parts of it may become liable to estate duty on the deaths within the next seven years of any of the other discretionary beneficiaries, and the trustees, who will be accountable for any such estate duty, may wish to obtain from the Estate Duty Office a certificate under section 44 (3), Finance Act 1950, which quantifies their liability. The test requires that regard to be had to all income subject to the discretionary trust arising since April 15th, 1963, up to the time of the particular payment in question and provides that the payment is to be treated as income to the extent that there was a balance of income at that time sufficient to cover it after allowing for all previous payments since April 15th, 1963, treated as income payments. For the purpose of the test, all income available during the period for distribution under the discretion is included whether it derives from the original trust fund or from accumulations or accretions subsequently added to it; there is no need to separate the income according to its sources.

Trustees need, therefore, to analyse their past accounts on this basis and keep a note of any income payments made to discretionary beneficiaries during the period April 15th, 1963 to April 15th, 1969, and of any unexhausted balance of income available for future distribution at the end of that period.

Beginning with April 16th, 1969, a similar analysis should in strictness be made whenever a payment is made. In practice it may be sufficient to make a formal analysis only when there is any uncertainty as to the status of a payment under the test. The figures required by such an analysis are:

- (1) any unexhausted balance of income brought forward; from the last analysis;
- (2) the income received during the intervening period; and
- (3) all payments made during that period.

The Association's Examinations

MEMBERSHIP of the Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants should shortly pass the 13,000 mark, according to a spokesman for the Association last week. This is in consequence of the results of the June series of examinations, in which 567 candidates successfully completed Part IV (Final).

The total entry for all four parts of the professional examination on this occasion was 7,399, of whom 2,838 (including 17 honours candidates) were successful. In the preliminary examination, 74 out of 176 candidates passed.

The percentage of passes in the Part IV examination alone was this time significantly higher than the overall average, reversing a trend which has been a cause of some concern to the Association's Council in recent years and to which the President, Mr E. Lediard Smith, F.A.C.C.A., made reference in his address at this year's annual meeting (The Accountant, April 30th). As mentioned above, 567 candidates passed in this part, this being 41.1 per cent of the 1,286 who entered.

We extend our congratulations to Messrs R. C. Payne, A. S. Chow, J. C. Spafford and K. J. Brown, who were awarded honours in Part IV.

Solicitors' Accounts

ELaw Society's Gazette. Earlier this year, the Council of the Society issued a statement reminding solicitors that a surplus of cash held in client account over the total of liabilities to clients constitutes, no less than a deficiency, a breach of the Accountants' Report Rules 1967. Where such a surplus is shown, the books of account do not correctly record the position at the bank as between office and client accounts, and incorrectly show a reduction in the liability to clients before that liability has in fact been reduced.

Some solicitors have evidently objected to the principles of accountancy and elementary bookkeeping involved in that statement. Whilst the Society's Council clearly considers it to be the most appropriate course that any solicitor who requires to be persuaded into acceptance of the statement should discuss the matter with his own accountant, it has also issued some further guidance to solicitors which 'should further their understanding and may, indeed, make such discussions unnecessary'.

Solicitors are therefore reminded by their Council that, inter alia, the essential element of a system of double-entry book-keeping is the ledger, of which the cash-book normally forms a separate part for reasons of convenience. The number of individual entries to be made in the ledger may be reduced by the use of books of prime entry 'which are called day-books or journals'. Delay in the posting of detail to the ledger should be kept to a minimum, and posting the detail before money is, in fact, moved from one bank account to the other makes the ledger incorrect.

These are points which accountants will no doubt bear well in mind when making their examination of a solicitor's books!

Post-Pergamon

BBRITISH standards of disclosure on the special interests of company directors are limping along behind those of the United States, sometimes very much to our cost'. This is the opinion of Mr Ian Fraser, director-general of the City Panel on Take-overs and Mergers.

Speaking to this week's conference of the British Accounting and Finance Association in Edinburgh, Mr Fraser called for a ban on any significant volume of trading by directors with public companies, other than under full disclosure and at arm's length. Any lesser standard, he suggested, would be a breach of their fiduciary duty.

Recent disclosures in the Pergamon episode, which formed the subject of a leading article in The Accountant for September 3rd, have raised some disquieting implications for investors and have inevitably attracted attention to the City Panel's functions. It has already been widely reported that the chairman of the Panel, Lord Shawcross, hopes to have discussions with representatives of the accountancy profession on the implications of the Price Waterhouse report; however, Lord Shawcross was recently stated to be on holiday, and it has not been officially indicated when such a meeting might take place.

Meanwhile, the profession's awareness of the need for improved standards of presentation and disclosure has already been demonstrated in the appointment by The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, with the support of other bodies, of the Accounting Standards Steering Committee. This committee's first draft has recently completed its 60-day exposure period and forms the subject of a feature on other pages of this issue.

Hotel Industry Investment Study

THE Little Neddy for Hotel and Catering has given formal approval for a study of the hotel industry's investment needs to 1980. The Cooper Brothers & Co consultancy firm, has been selected to carry out the study which aims to establish a clear picture of the structure and basic economics of the hotel industry and competing forms of accommodation – such as motels, caravans and holiday camps. It should provide forecasts of all factors affecting future investment and can therefore be used as a guide by individual hoteliers in planning their long-term development.

The Little Neddy anticipates the study will provide a firm basis for its future economic assessments of the industry so that eventually there will be a continuously updated analysis of the industry's progress and potential – and this will include its foreign currency earning capacity.

When the present loans and grants scheme comes to a close in March 1971, the study will help government by providing the informative picture it requires for assessing the industry's needs. Besides being of help to both government and industry, the study aims to provide some of the basic data needed by regional authorities and tourist boards.

From go-ahead to publication, the study should take about nine to twelve months to produce.

Management on Trial

VISCOUNT WATKINSON, P.C., C.H., chairman of the British Institute of Management's Council, observed this week that 'Management is on trial as never before, and by management I do not only mean the management of private enterprise business. Wherever one looks, there is a new interest in the techniques of management – in the Civil Service, for example, or a closer association with business management now being pioneered by the present Government. The better management of our natural environment has now become a burning issue and there is a new interest in management in local government, in the professions and in our universities.'

Inevitably, the BIM finds itself closely involved – whether it likes it or not – with a very large number of important national issues. According to Lord Watkinson, it wants to be involved. Indeed, in his report on the accounts and activities of the BIM for the year ended March 31st, 1970, he stresses its good organization and satisfactory service not only to members but also in a public role. From a financial point of view the results are commendable; gross revenue increased from £1,112,474 to £1,266,652, showing a surplus of £20,887 before tax, not a bad result for a non-profit-making concern, although it must be borne in mind that the BIM is in receipt of substantial grants from the Board of Trade. There was an appreciable increase in both corporate and individual membership which now total, respectively, 13,021 and 29,971.

For some time the Council has been considering the desirability of the Institute assuming charitable status in order to enjoy greater resources for a wider range of industrial, social and public activities. Needless to say, there would also be the benefit of tax relief.

After a thorough examination of the situation, the Council has proposed – subject to ratification at an extraordinary general meeting on October 7th – that the BIM should formally seek charitable status.

Lord Watkinson has completed his two-year term of office as chairman of the Council, which he described as 'challenging and fascinating'. He is to continue in this office until a successor has been elected.

County Courts to Decimalize

FOLLOWING last week's report 'Probate Grants in Decimals' in these columns, it has been announced that all County Courts and district registries of the High Court will change their accounting procedures from £ s d to £p on D-day, February 15th next.

Transitional arrangements will be similar to those in the probate registries. As from October 1st, the amount of any claim or counterclaim will be required in both currencies, conversion being effected in accordance with the 'whole penny' table. As from D-day, all warrants, judgment summonses and orders are to be expressed in decimal currency only.

County Court and district registry offices will be closed on February 11th and 12th, except as directed by the judge in cases of urgent business.

Any cheques drawn in £p prior to D-day will be invalid, and will be returned to the drawer for amendment. Cheques drawn in £ s d prior to D-day but received shortly thereafter will be converted to £p by the Court. All cheques drawn on and after D-day must be in £p unless accompanied by a banker's certificate.

Any further information concerning decimalization in County Courts and district registries may be obtained from the County Courts branch of the Lord Chancellor's Department, 3 Dean's Yard, London SW1, quoting reference DEC/FIN/RHU.

Housing Finance

FEW issues in post-war Britain have been so bedevilled by political considerations as housing rents. The results of the unwillingness of successive governments to tackle the twin problem of council subsidies, and controlled rents in the private sector, has led to misallocation of accommodation and economic resources, not to mention a serious deterioration in part of the nation's stock of dwellings.

At the annual meeting of The Association of Municipal Corporations in Torquay last week, Councillor Bernard Perkins, Leader of the Lambeth Borough Council, made a strong plea for a review of housing finance. He stressed that the only solution lay in 'a total and radical change in the subsidy system' for the 'nonsense of the present system is manifest'.

He questioned the logic of a system which disbursed over £100 million a year in Exchequer subsidies and another £50 million a year in rate-borne subsidies for council tenants, while elsewhere the housing situation was deteriorating. Nor did he regard as sensible the present situation in which some local authorities can charge less than £2 per week for a three-bedroom house and still balance their housing revenue accounts, while other authorities were charging over £7 per week and incurring deficits of £2 million per annum and more.

Councillor Perkins observed that the problem was not restricted to the public sector, and asked whether it was right that 'tenants of private rented accommodation may be living below subsistence level but have no recourse to rent rebates'. Equally important was the further point that private rented accommodation is falling out of use because landlords were unable to charge economic rents.

For the speaker the solution lay – as far as council rents were concerned – in extending the present 'fair rents' legislation to the public sector coupled with a rent rebate scheme, which should also be extended to the private sector. In particular, he wanted Exchequer subsidies to be used to meet any resultant deficiency in the housing accounts of individual local authorities.

It is no secret that the prospective deficiencies on these accounts under the present system will impose, and in a very short period of time, serious financial problems on some of the London boroughs.

THIS IS MY LIFE

Like Father, like Son

by An Industrious Accountant

HE joined our group for Saturday morning coffee as the guest of the oldest practitioner. He was talkative, as befitted one who'd qualified near the top of the list recently, and a little patronizing, as befitted a member of a big London firm. He sat back blowing blue smoke-rings as he explained to us out-of-touch provincials how modern audits were organized.

His firm, he said, was sectioned off into several autonomous units run by particular partners with rigid disciplinary precision, unlike the haphazard catch-as-catch-can of previous decades. He worked only within his own unit, with his team of subordinates and older men (he somehow indicated that these latter didn't really amount to much), and his boss was a regular martinet. Life was tough but rewarding for those prepared to drive themselves late and early.

The OP commented that surely the martinets so commonplace in the past were obsolete these days, but our visitor put him right. Only razor-sharp efficiency could maintain the high-level standards needed nowadays. He personally was given a maximum time allowance to the nearest half man-day for every job, and woe betide his reputation if he exceeded it. He didn't so much cut corners as shave them!

Not that he ran risks, of course. He verified assets and liabilities, but he merely test-checked 5 per cent samples of debtors' or creditors' accounts, for example. He examined the extent of the control systems and internal audit checks, and circulated questionnaires with Yes/No boxes to be ticked. He concentrated on potentially weak areas and worked his team regularly on overtime. Juniors, it seemed, were 'less than the dust beneath his chariot wheels'. He got the results that way.

The youngest practitioner in our group raised his eyebrows at the mention of overtime, but our visitor said that it had earned him his Christmas bonus, which seemed to be conclusive.

Frankly, I didn't like him. He was too like his father, who'd been my own senior in my early articulated days, and had driven me just as hard. I remembered working with him on a cigarette factory audit, slogging away at debtors' balances till 8.30 p.m. I wanted a break on the first Thursday morning to go on one of the hour-long weekly tours of the works. Not only for the 50-cigarette souvenir box given to the tourists, be it said in fairness, but also to see the wheels go round.

The senior wouldn't hear of it. The time-table was too dashed tight, he remonstrated. Besides, our principal might phone and ask for me . . . better let it wait till next week.

Needless to say, our principal was never likely to ring for a lowly clerk, and anyhow he was too reasonable a man to object to the tour and I could have rung back. The senior said the same thing for three weeks, and on the third Saturday I got a new assignment for the following Monday. So from that day to this I've never seen cigarettes being manufactured, and now I've given up smoking except for the odd cigar on special occasions.

But what rubbed salt into the wound was the discovery later that my high principled senior had himself done the tour, and taken his perquisite, each week of the three.

I knew I was being unreasonable and uncharitable about the block's young chip, but it's odd how the old wound smarted suddenly.

Accounting for the Results of Associated Companies

THE first paper to be issued by the Accounting Standards Steering Committee of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales dealt with accounting for the results of 'associated' companies – defined as those companies in which the principal company either is concerned in a joint venture, or holds a substantial shareholding which (although not exceeding 50 per cent so as to constitute a holding and subsidiary company relationship) enables it to exercise a significant influence. A figure of 20 per cent of the equity voting rights was suggested as 'substantial', having regard also to the disposition of other shareholdings.

The full text of this paper was published in The Accountant for June 25th. It has recently completed its 60-day period as an exposure draft – during which about 3,000 copies were issued – and the comments of approximately 150 interested parties are now being studied at the Institute. There are indications that some replies are both far-reaching and controversial.

After consideration of the comments made in response to the exposure draft, the steering committee will make its final recommendations to the councils of the three participating Institutes. Subject to ratification by their respective councils, members will then be expected to implement the new principles in practice, with qualification of the audit report as a potential sanction for non-observance. An effective date early in 1971 has been mentioned as a possibility, which appears to call for vigorous action by the steering committee and its secretariat in summarizing and reconciling the views of so many different interests.

In distributing the exposure draft, the English Institute made it clear that all replies would be regarded as a matter of public record unless confidence was specifically requested. Subject to the exercise of this option in individual cases, it therefore remains open to the Institute to publish at some future date the representations which it has received. In view of the fact that the present proposals represent a major innovation in the treatment of associated companies' results and have evidently aroused much interest, it is to be hoped that the Institute will avail itself of this opportunity.

Meanwhile, The Accountant has invited a representative selection of professional opinion from a practising accountant, a stockbroker, an institutional investor, and an accountancy lecturer.

A Practitioner's View

by H. S. A. MACNAIR, F.C.A.

THE major difficulty presented by the proposed standard is likely to arise over the identification of an associated company. The criteria in Part II are brief and vague. Hence this is liable to become another of those debatable points admitting of diverse solutions at the time but inviting recriminations in retrospect.

The literal meaning of the test in 6 (a) seems to be that were it not for incorporation, the relationship between the members of the associated company would be that of general partners. If so, the test is probably too wide. What has been correctly grasped is the notion of an unfettered interest in the increasing profitability of the joint venture. Such a participation contrasts with that which would exist in a company formed, for example, to link operators with suppliers or distributors on either side in the chain of production. Managed as a compromise between competing interests, an intermediary of this nature would be animated by a spirit quite at variance with the concept of 'utmost good faith' required from the members of a partnership. One may expect, therefore, that the 6 (a) type will appear in the form of a joint operating venture designed to provide major customers with a package deal not capable of delivery except by the co-operation of varied competences.

This differs from the type of company contemplated by 6 (b) where the management is likely to be independent, although susceptible to pressures from shareholders on policy matters. Despite their tendency to hover in the wings, a number of financial institutions are likely to qualify under this heading and perhaps the specified 20 per cent disclosure will assist a uniform approach from this sector.

It would be a pity to attach undue importance to an arbitrary percentage when reviewing relationships where the provision of permanent risk capital is subordinate to other objectives, such as procurement or marketing. Many companies, set up with nominal amounts of share capital, are financed by loans or subventions, as illustrated by the case of British Commonwealth International Newsfilm Agency Ltd v. Mahany (41 ATC 407). Indeed, a useful criterion of common interest can be derived from tax precedents, such as section 258 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970 under the provisions of which joint members of a consortium are in a position to obtain tax relief on each other's losses. The fact that they have taken advantage of that opportunity would be a strong pointer to the existence of a close working relationship and it is noteworthy that no minimum level of equity participation is specified, provided that the entire capital is held by five or fewer companies.

Contributions other than capital

Not a few significant joint enterprises involve a contribution of know-how or facilities rather than capital. For smaller companies the visible capital commitment may be small, although the contribution to net profits by the associated company may be substantial. The present trend towards a uniform standard for large and small companies suggests disclosure that the source of profits in an associated company would be appropriate when a substantial proportion is derived from it – certainly if as much as 50 per cent. The failure to consider this measure may stem from a preoccupation with quantified book values as the source of profits rather than the unwritten goodwill of personnel and opportunity. Such a situation is much more likely to arise for a small company with an important, although subordinate, role in an associated company serving a wider organization.

Conversely, an accountant might wish that there could be a more reasonable attitude towards trifling ventures which occupy disproportionate effort in consolidation. One suspects that directors may be reluctant to make an issue of the exceptions which they are permitted to make.

If modern accounts are designed to serve wider interests than those of their shareholders, it becomes pertinent to inquire whether the consolidated profits are as freely available to loan creditors and others as those reported for the parent company. It is not so much break-up values which matter here as the availability of group profits to service debt redemption and expanding capital requirements. Normally, the transfer of profits from an associate to the parent will involve a sacrifice to the Inland Revenue of income tax at the standard rate, and the opportunity to recover this is deferred indefinitely in the absence of current losses or dividend distributions on the part of the investing company.

Transfers of the gross profits are, however, competent for companies eligible under the terms of section 256 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970. This option is available to a consortium participant owning as little as 5 per cent of the associate equity, but it does not extend to non-residents. Here again this lower level of participation should suffice in appropriate instances for a United Kingdom associate.

One may conclude with a plea to mitigate the proliferation of paper work. The introduction of significant information relating to external enterprises should surely be balanced by the optional exclusion of any interests which together represent less than 1 per cent of the net worth or income of the reporting company. Indeed, a legislative change to this effect to eliminate dormant subsidiaries is overdue.

A Stockbroker's View

by S. J. TITCOMB, F.C.A., a partner in Messrs de Zoete & Gorton

STOCKBROKERS who are concerned with the analysis of company accounts from the investors' point of view are likely to favour the proposals in the exposure draft for the following reasons:

- (1) The adoption of these proposals will lead to a fuller statement of the profits and assets attributable to ordinary shareholders of companies with major associates.
- (2) Some major public companies already adopt procedures similar to those recommended and their more universal acceptance will increase comparability between companies' earnings.

From an analyst's point of view there are, however, a number of ways in which it would be possible to improve the recommendations. In their present form it is not possible accurately to determine:

- (1) the importance of individual associated companies; or
- (2) the earnings actually available for distribution to ordinary shareholders.

Accounting for individual associated companies

Investment advisers analysing the accounts of public companies constantly aim to divide the total figure of group earnings between geographical areas and product groups. Many companies have in the past claimed that such divisions are irrelevant. However, the principle has been accepted and companies must now give a breakdown of sales and profits divided according to the main activities of the group.

When a group also operates through a number of associated companies it is equally important to be able to identify not only the total share of profits from associated companies but also any individual company which provides a material share of total group earnings or employs a material share of total group assets.

It therefore appears desirable that, additionally:

- (1) The figures for sales, profit before tax, tax and ordinary share earnings attributable to the investing company should be given for each major associated company where its share is 5 per cent or more of the total group profits, sales or assets.
- (2) Where a single associated company accounts for a material share of total group sales, profits or assets (say 15 per cent), that company's accounts should be included in summarized form.

In the case of a trade investment which accounts for more than 10 per cent of the profits or assets of the investing company, a note should be included indicating the investing company's share of:

- (a) aggregate profits (or losses) before taxation;
- (b) taxation;
- (c) profit (or loss) after tax;
- (d) accumulated undistributed profits (or losses) since date of acquisition.

Earnings available for distribution

The inclusion of associated company profits gives greater importance to the question of how much of the investing company's earnings really are available for distribution to ordinary shareholders. Dividend cover is an important concept in investment and it is generally accepted that this is the number of times the ordinary dividend can be paid out of ordinary share earnings. There have, in the past, been companies whose dividends appeared adequately covered but were not able to maintain them because a high proportion of their profit was earned in subsidiary companies where full distribution to the parent was not practical owing to:

- (a) taxation suffered as a result of the remittance of overseas profits;
- (b) overseas exchange control regulations limiting distribution; or
- (c) the presence of minority shareholdings.

This type of limitation will become more important when a high proportion of a company's profits is derived from a source where there is no control over dividend policy.

In accounting terms, this problem is supposed to be covered by the figure in the group profit and loss account showing to what extent the profits are dealt with in the parent company and to what extent they are dealt with in subsidiaries. This is, however, of little more value in assessing the ability of a company to pay a dividend than is the fact that it may have substantial retained earnings. The determining factor of dividend policy tends to be the available profits derived from earnings in the year in question. The consolidation of the earnings of associated companies highlights the need to indicate in the profit and loss account the amount of the current year's earnings which are available for dividend payments or which the directors could make available with no further burden of taxation.

It is, therefore, desirable that the profit available to members of the investing company should be split between profits actually available for distribution (on the above definition) and profits retained in subsidiary and associated companies.

There are a number of other minor particulars in which the information required needs to be extended if a proper analysis is to be made of a group which includes associated companies:

- (1) Sales of associated companies (attributable to the parent company) should be shown by way of a note.
- (2) All royalties and interest paid by an associated company to the investing company should be disclosed.
- (3) Exceptional items should always show that portion which relates to associated companies. Unless every item in the profit and loss account is so divided, it becomes impossible accurately to detach the investments in associated companies and look at the main group in isolation.

Different patterns of association

The exposure draft lists two types of associated company:

- (1) A joint venture, such as Costain Press or Howden & Parsons, which is run for the benefit of the shareholding companies.
- (2) Large trade investments, such as Imperial Tobacco's interest in British American Tobacco, Burmah Oil's stake in BP, and Babcock & Wilcox's German and French associates.

In the case of the associated company under category 2, the investing company is rarely in a position to exercise significant control because the directors must consider the interests of all shareholders and any proposals by the major shareholder may conflict with the interests of the remainder.

There is divided opinion among chartered accountants and stockbrokers as to whether companies should consolidate the earnings of this second class of company. On the whole, because it is difficult to draw a precise line on this point, it appears preferable to incorporate the appropriate share of the earnings of investments in this class of associated company. If this is done, it is essential that the accounts should state the extent to which distribution of the earnings is outside the control of the parent company board.

An Institutional Investor's View

by the Investment Manager of a leading Insurance Company

IN general, institutional investors will be examining the accounts of an industrial company from the point of view of an equity shareholder, present or prospective. This is not entirely the case, however, since – particularly in the case of insurance companies – they also have substantial holdings in debentures, loan stocks and preference shares. As at December 31st, 1969, the insurance companies together held some £2,800 million invested in this form as against some £4,000 million in equities (by book value in each case) – and here somewhat different considerations may and do arise.

Limitations of statutory accounts

As an equity investor the institutional investor is not really interested in the statutory accounts – the company as a separate legal entity – at all: he is only interested in figures for the group as a whole. Further, he is not particularly interested in the figures in the absolute but rather in comparative figures and trends such as comparisons over a period of years in the same company, with other companies in the same industry, with companies in other industries, and so on.

From the point of view of the institutional investor, therefore, the desiderata as regards company accounts are that they should:

- (1) be as informative as possible over the whole range of the company's activities;
- (2) be compiled as consistently as possible from one year to another with attention being drawn, where necessary, to any disturbing feature (in the arithmetical sense) due to changes in accountancy methods and bases in the company concerned, etc.;
- (3) be compiled as consistently as possible from one company to another and from one industry to another.

The institutional investor fully appreciates the difficulties, as is recognized by referring in the previous paragraph to 'desiderata' rather than 'objectives'. Nevertheless, he obviously welcomes any step towards their attainment, such as the one now in contemplation. It has for long been an anachronism that there should be such a complete difference in treatment as between a, say, 51 per cent holding in a subsidiary company and a 49 per cent holding in an associated company. In the case of an associated company he could at present, unbeknown to him, be sitting on a gold mine; or, per contra, he could be faced with a perpetually running sore eating away the value of his investment. It is not as though there is any question of secrecy involved: industrious analysts can and do from time to time piece together relevant information culled from the accounts and share registers of the associated company(ies) concerned.

More information

It will be clear from the foregoing that the institutional investor likes as much information as possible to be included in a company's set of accounts, and if he is asked 'would you like information about so and so?' he is bound to say, 'Yes, please'. On the other hand, there must necessarily be a limit to the amount of extra work which one can demand that a company should incur in preparing its accounts and indeed to the amount of information the investor can absorb.

One wonders, therefore, whether it might not be possible to devise some relatively simple formula which would absolve a company from this extra work in circumstances where the additional information is unlikely to be worth the trouble involved.

Borrowing powers

The inclusion of appropriate figures for associated companies does, however, pose in some ways a special problem concerning the 'parent' company's borrowing powers and it must be realized that however appropriate it undoubtedly is, that the interest in the associated companies should be reflected in the 'parent' company's figures, it must not expect to be able to borrow moneys on a formula incorporating the associated companies' figures.

However much the 'parent' may be able in accordance with the definition of an associated company given under paragraph 6 of part 2 of the 'Proposed Statement' to exercise a significant influence over the 'associated company', it cannot actually control its borrowings or any charges it may care to give over its assets. So far as borrowings are concerned, therefore, the interest in an associated company cannot be brought into account either by way of assets or earnings, except, perhaps, in the latter case to the extent of dividends declared and paid by the associated company out of profits. Further, a lender to the 'parent' may well wish to place some limitation on the financing of the associated company by the 'parent'.

At the time that this comment is being written the proposal is open for discussion only. It must be admitted that only in a comparatively small number of cases will it provide any worth-while new information which was not previously either known or suspected by professional analysts. On the other hand it is a perfectly logical step, long overdue, and one which should certainly be welcomed by the institutional investor from the equity point of view. From the fixed interest point of view the institutional investor will necessarily be less enthusiastic.

An Academic View

by R. W. MOON, B.Litt., F.C.A., Senior Lecturer in Business Finance, Lanchester Polytechnic

THE growing practice of companies trading through a consortium or joint venture in which they have a substantial but not a controlling interest has not generally been brought out into the open in the same way as group accounts reveal the aggregate profits or losses and the underlying assets and liabilities of a parent company and its subsidiaries.

The proposals, therefore, seek to remedy the situation and at the same time meet the very real criticism that, without taking in the share of earnings or losses of associated companies, the P/E ratio, on which investors and financial analysts place so much weight, would be based on an inaccurate earnings base.

Trade investments

It is difficult to ascertain the measure of these 'companies of convenience' as they might be called. Until now, interests in associated companies have usually been classified under trade or other investments in the balance sheet; and, moreover, are not confined to equity holdings. According to the Board of Trade regular analyses of published company accounts, trade and other investments represent something like 5 per cent of total net assets, but this average figure varies from one industry group to another and more widely still among individual public companies.

Many hold trade investments in the true sense of the word though with far too small a stake in the other company(s) to qualify under the present definition, even though the investment may represent a significant proportion of its own net assets. Thus, as much as 90 per cent of the net assets of Greeff-Chemicals Holdings consists of investments in both quoted (Philblack Ltd) and unquoted companies (British Titan Products and Minnesota Mining & Manufacturing Co) recently revalued: while, in the case of Burmah Oil, they have a substantial stake in British Petroleum (23¼ per cent) and a smaller, though valuable interest (3½ per cent) in Shell Transport & Trading Co which together are valued at £525 million out of total net assets of just under £750 million. But, here again, the definition could not apply because Burmah Oil does not participate in the commercial and financial policy decisions so far as BP is concerned.

The terms of the draft are, therefore, likely to concern more recently acquired interests such as Reed International's 50 per cent interest in two Canadian pulp companies (Prince George Pulp and Paper and Intercontinental Pulp Co), its 50 per cent interest in Denside Paper Co (acquired jointly with Bowaters from Inveresk Paper) and the 33⅓ per cent stake in Kimberly-Clarke Ltd. Though whether all or any of these will be designated associated companies for this purpose remains to be seen.

Take-over bids

The same problem confronts the General Electric and English Electric companies where as a result of take-over bids, first for AEI and then for English Electric, the group now owns substantial interests in associated companies (quite apart from trade investments shown separately in the 1970 annual report) which are described as investments where 'there are rights to profit participation or there is the equivalent of a partnership between the shareholders or there is significant interest in the equity coupled with a supply arrangement with the company concerned'.

Consequently, the definition probably applies to relatively few but easily identified situations where the intentions of the partners concerned are clear right from the outset like that referred to in the 'Finance and Commerce' section of a recent issue of this journal,¹ which dealt with the accounts of Boosey & Hawkes including its joint venture with the Hammond Organ Co, of Chicago. Most interests in associated companies originated from direct investment of funds by the constituent companies themselves or through one of their subsidiaries but a few are indirectly the result of a merger or take-over. 'Indirectly' is the operative word here because most mergers and take-overs are conditional upon 90 per cent acceptance or such lower percentage as is acceptable to the bidder whose ultimate aim is to gain control.

Indirect holdings

The only other possibility that exists is that a bidder with at least a 10 per cent interest in another company might take over a company also with a 10 per cent interest in the same associated company, making 20 per cent in all. It could make all the difference between earnings and dividend income in the group accounts.

On the other hand, a trade investment can be extinguished by a merger or take-over in cases where the share capital not already owned is the subject of the offer.

The proposals put forward recognize the forging of new trading links and bring a new dimension to the 'group' concept, but with the Pergamon/ILSC affair fresh in mind, it might be wiser to insist upon audited accounts where the amounts involved are material and always in the case of the accounts for the first trading period, whether material or not.

Professional Training in the Future

English President's Address to Internal Auditors

THE President of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, Mr C. Croxton-Smith, M.A., LL.B., F.C.A., was the principal guest at last Wednesday's luncheon of the London Chapter of the Institute of Internal Auditors. In the course of his address, the President said:

'The scheme of integration for the accountancy profession is not now going ahead, but I do not think the scheme itself was of interest so much as the developments which are taking place, and are likely to take place, in the profession and in the education of its students.

'It is true that the six bodies concerned in the production of what was called "The Scheme for the Development of the Accountancy Profession in Great Britain and Ireland" will have to do some further thinking; but a great deal of time, research, and effort was given to that scheme by leading members of those bodies, and it seems a fair assumption that many of the ideas contained in it will provide the basis for the development of the six bodies in the immediate future.

'As far as the education and training of students is concerned, there were three main points contained in the scheme:

- (1) The raising of the educational standards for entry into training to become a chartered accountant;
- (2) The extension of the training contract, or articles, to industry and the public service;
- (3) The recognition of the fact that training for a profession consists of two parts – the academic and the practical, the former being done in a university or technical college, and the latter in a practising office, in industry or the public service.

Graduate entry

'With regard to the first point, I think it is essential that the entry standard is raised at least to that required by the universities, and I must confess that I personally would like to see the chartered institutes require a graduate entry. There is evidence that the average "O"-level school-leaver is finding the major professional examinations rather too much, and that a further spell at school in the sixth form would be better for those seeking to become chartered accountants. Some other professions already require a graduate entry and these tend to attract the men and women with the best degrees.

'The second point, the question of training in industry and the public service, raises a much more contentious matter. I think it is true to say that those who supported the scheme of integration believed that accountancy was basically one skill whether carried on in public practice, industry, or the public service, and that therefore we should all be in one professional body. The opponents of the scheme believed that these three streams of accountancy were quite different things. If the six bodies concerned with this scheme had become one, then clearly provision for training in industry and the public service would have been necessary; the non-chartered bodies have always permitted their students to train in these two streams. With the rejection of the scheme, the chartered bodies have to decide whether or not to continue to confine their training to practising offices as is done at the moment. Before this question can be answered, thought may well have to be given to the extent to which the nature of small accountancy practices has changed during recent years through industrial mergers and take-overs, through the increasing complexity of all legislation with the increasing need for consultancy, and through the hardening of opinion, and in some countries of the law, in favour of the main group auditor carrying out the audit of all the subsidiaries in the group.

Training proposals

'Many small offices will, I think, give up training chartered accountant students, leaving this to the larger offices who can appoint training officers to be in charge of their students. Will firms in industry be prepared to adopt training schemes which will do more than train accountants and executives for a particular firm? The industrial members of my own council thought that they would, but the idea of training chartered accountants in industry raised a good deal of opposition and this is a matter still to be resolved.

'The third point I mentioned was the increasing part played by the universities and colleges of technology in the training of chartered accountants. Many universities have for some time been offering courses approved by my Institute which lead to a degree and exemption from our professional intermediate examination. More recently, colleges of technology and commerce have been offering to school-leavers with two "A" levels and a promise of articles from a principal, a nine-month preliminary course with an examination at the end of it, success in which gives exemption from our professional intermediate examination as well. There are nothing like enough of these courses yet to cater for all "A"-level school-leavers entering into training. From the principal's point of view, these courses have the advantage that most local education authorities will make grants to the students, and many of the colleges give tuition to the students for our final examinations, thus replacing postal tuition with something a little more personal. There must be between 40,000 and 50,000 students struggling to take up accountancy, and at this moment there are nothing like enough tutors and lecturers of sufficient quality to mount the courses and supply the training that is required.

'At the moment, a chartered accountant may engage in public practice as soon as he is qualified, but the scheme of integration would have required him to obtain at least two years' approved practical experience before engaging in public practice. This may well be something which will be adopted and I doubt if many would quarrel with such a requirement.

'The scheme said little, if anything, about post-qualification courses and study, but this is something which is becoming of increasing concern to all accountancy bodies. The newly qualified man is a very general practitioner: if he goes into industry, all the big firms will put him through their own training, and – later – refresher courses: the large practising firms now do likewise: both will provide their own specialist training for new developments as these occur – over recent years, for instance, cash flow, the provision of cash for capital growth or to combat inflation, profit forecasting, computerization, tax, and other legal complications, decimalization, metrication, and the problems arising from our possible or probable entry into the European Economic Community. The small practitioner and the member employed by small industrial concerns, of whom there are many thousands, has got to fend for himself with the help of his professional body.

'The major accountancy bodies all put out a great deal of literature and mount many courses to help their members keep abreast of all this new knowledge they are required to have. It is a cause of great concern to my council that such a small percentage of our members avail themselves of these facilities: many, who do not, regularly complain that nothing is done for them: yet our standing and reputation in the community will increase or decrease in accordance with the extent to which we are able to meet the new technological demands that are made upon us. There has been much public comment and criticism of the state of the United Kingdom economy. Members of the accountancy profession take quite a part in the running of that economy, and must bear some part of this criticism.

Accounting standards

'This leads me to speak of a committee which we have recently set up, following criticism of the accountancy profession in the national press during the last year or two. This arose partly in connection with certain mergers and take-overs, and partly from cases which gave rise to Court action or to the appointment of inspectors by the Board of Trade, whose reports incidentally are still awaited. It has been said often enough that the production and presentation of company accounts are the responsibility of the directors, but nonetheless accountants, both in industry and public practice, play a great part in this and, for that matter, in the education of directors as to the meaning and use of financial information and the production of accounts. What the public at large (particularly shareholders and directors) do not seem to have realized is that behind the "true and fair view" of the auditors' report there are 101 ways of presenting the same information – each one perhaps giving quite a different figure of profit and of fixed and current assets.

'One of my predecessors in office said in reply to press comment a little while ago: "When you break into a continuing flow of transactions to produce a set of accounts on a given date, all kinds of problems of valuation arise." So they do. Hitherto each individual board of directors, with the assistance of their own accounting staff and auditors, have been left to find the solution they think most appropriate to their own particular company, within very broad guidelines laid down in the Companies Acts.

'We have from time to time issued accounting recommendations on areas of difficulty, and on interpretation of the requirements of the Companies Acts, but if members chose to disregard these they have not been made, for that reason alone, subject to our disciplinary procedure. In view of the events and criticisms during the last few years to which I have referred, it does seem as if individual boards of directors and their accounting staff and auditors will have to surrender some of their freedom of choice in the presentation of published accounts.

'This has led to the setting up of our "Accounting Standards Steering Committee". The intention behind this is the narrowing of the bases upon which published accounts may be produced, so that some degree of uniformity may be achieved and help to avoid the sort of thing that happened on, for instance, the GEC/AEI merger.

'This committee has already produced one exposure draft – on accounting for the results of associated companies – which has been distributed to our own members, to other accountancy bodies, and to other interested parties outside the accountancy profession, such as the CBI. When their comments have been received and considered, a final draft will be prepared and submitted to the councils of the several accountancy bodies.

Penalties for non-observance

'If my council approves it, the statement will be published and those auditors who are our members will be expected to observe it or to note on published accounts any departures from it: failure to do this could lead to disciplinary proceedings. All this is an attempt to meet, voluntarily, public criticism and to find a solution to our accounting problems rather than to have a solution imposed upon us from outside.

'There is one other suggestion in the scheme of integration to which I must refer, namely the proposed establishment of a second tier of membership, which has become referred to as the "technician grade". I think this would be a good thing. There is ample scope for the establishment of a grade below that of the fully qualified man or woman and yet offering membership of the Institute and subject to its training and ethical rules. This could be the means of bringing some good school-leavers into the profession.

'I have said what I think about the future direction of training for students. I would think that the size of industrial units must go on increasing, and it is the larger units including the nationalized industries that mostly employ internal auditors. Size is not necessarily a good thing unless it leads to benefits such as increased efficiency, the saving of overheads, and the availability of research – including research in the field of accountancy.

'Members of the Institute of Internal Auditors must have a considerable part to play in this field, and also in connection with the work of the Accounting Standards Steering Committee. This I regard as the most important development of recent years, and one which is vital if the accounting profession is to retain the confidence of the public.'

Legal and General announce no increase in their premiums

Yes, choosing a motor insurance policy is a pretty disheartening business. A lot of motorists find that, after a year in which they were paying less on 'special plans', their premiums are going up.

Not Legal and General's. We still offer you security, stability and a fair deal at a reasonable cost. This has been our policy for the last 130 years.

Last year, we offered competitive rates to the 'best risks', and fair policies to those who didn't qualify for the new

'special plans'. This year our attitude hasn't changed. Nor have our premiums.

So when your policy is due for renewal, do business with the company that offers you security at reasonable rates.

Telephone your nearest Legal and General branch now. And they will quote you for a motor policy you can trust.

The Valuation of Unquoted Shares – II

In this second article, R. A. Stockwell, B.A., A.C.A., examines the particular problems of valuing shares for the purpose of estate duty.

THE legislation which brought in the concept of the 'open market' in order to value shares in unquoted companies for estate duty purposes is contained in section 7 (5) of the Finance Act 1894. The relevant section is as follows:

'The principal value of any property shall be estimated to be the price which, in the opinion of the Commissioners, such property would fetch if sold in the open market at the time of the death of the deceased. . . .'

In applying this legislation to the valuation of minority holdings no particular problems arise and the principles of valuation in relation to minority holdings discussed in the previous section of this paper are relevant for the purpose of valuing minority holdings of shares in private companies for estate duty purposes.

Valuations of majority holdings

There is one particular occasion where the Legislature has specified a certain method of valuation to a shareholding in a private company for estate duty purposes. The legislation is contained in the Finance Act 1940 which laid down artificial conditions under which the shares of a deceased shareholder should be valued providing certain conditions are fulfilled. The legislation was contained in sections 46–55 of the 1940 Act, but it is proposed to mention only briefly in this paper the difficulties that may arise under section 46 of that Act, as the Inland Revenue have stated that the provisions of this particular section will not be applied in an unreasonable fashion. This section is designed to deal with the situation where a shareholder in a company is entitled to apply the major part of a company's income for his own benefit. The section stipulates that in such a situation the value of the company passing on death will not be determined by reference to the shareholding but on the 'slice' of benefit passing. The fraction applicable to the net asset value arising on death will therefore not be determined by the percentage shareholding but on this 'slice' provision.

The principal provision brought in by the 1940 Act is, however, contained in section 55 and it is perhaps worth while to reproduce certain sections of the legislation therein contained:

- (1) Where for the purpose of estate duty there pass, on the death of a person dying after the commencement of this Act, shares in or debentures of a company to which this section applies, then if:
 - (a) the deceased had the control of the company at any time during the seven (introduced by the Finance Act 1968) years ending with his death . . . the principal value of the shares or debentures, in lieu of being estimated in accordance with the provisions of subsection (5) of section 7 of the Finance Act 1894, shall be estimated by reference to the net value of the assets of the company in accordance with the provisions of the next succeeding subsection.
 - (2) For the purposes of such ascertainment as aforesaid:
 - (a) the net value of the assets of the company shall be taken to be the principal value thereof estimated in accordance with the said subsection (5), less the like allowance for liabilities of the company; . . .

- (b) the aggregate value of all the shares and debentures of the company issued and outstanding at the death of the deceased shall be taken to be the same as the net value of the assets of the company;
- (c) in a case in which there are both shares in and debentures of the company issued and outstanding at the death, or different classes of either, the net value of the assets of the company shall be apportioned between them with due regard to the rights attaching thereto respectively.

The main statutory problems arising on a section 55 valuation are those of defining the meaning of 'debenture' together with the definition of liabilities. However, before dealing in detail with these specific difficulties, it is perhaps worth while to consider the valuation of assets in general terms.

The reader will no doubt be familiar with the basic concept of a section 55 valuation and it must be noted that section 55 does not tell the valuer how to value the assets, but states that the valuation is to be according to the principles laid down under section 7 (5) of the Finance Act 1894. Therefore it is normal to commence the valuation with the previous balance sheet of the company and, in cases where a substantial change has taken place, to reconcile the actual fixed assets at the date of death with those appearing in the last balance sheet. Similarly it is usual to take account of a proportion of the net profits for the current year.

Fixed assets

It is suggested that no real difficulty should arise on the valuation of plant and machinery, furniture and fittings, motor vehicles and normal trading assets. However, with increasing property values it would be wise to obtain a professional valuation of land and buildings. Mention must be made of an important relief granted by section 66, Finance Act 1960, in determining the 'market value' of land and buildings. In the case of a death after April 4th, 1960, the value of land and buildings is to be estimated as if they were being sold, subject to an enforceable restriction that they were to be used or occupied solely for the purpose of that business. The relief granted by section 66 extends to other assets of the company though it is difficult to see what other assets could possibly benefit by this relief.

Subsidiary companies

The assets basis of valuation has to be followed throughout the group and, as in this type of valuation we are dealing with 'control' for company law purposes rather than taxation purposes, subsidiary will have the meaning assigned to it by the Companies Act 1948 rather than by the Finance Act 1938. Deductions are, of course, allowed from the assets value of subsidiary companies for any minority interests.

Investments, unless they are unquoted investments, and debtors present no special problem. In the case of unquoted investments where a minority holding is involved, then of course a separate share valuation of the particular asset will be necessary.

Liabilities

Mention has been made of this particular problem and it is worth while considering the provisions of section 50 of the Finance Act 1940 which lays down the method of determining the company's liabilities.

'The Commissioners shall make an allowance from the principal value of those assets for all liabilities of the company other than:

- (a) liabilities in respect of shares or debentures;
- (b) liabilities incurred otherwise than for the purpose of the business of the company wholly and exclusively.'

This seems fairly clear but the opening preamble to the section does in fact say that the Commissioners shall make an allowance from the principal value of the assets for all liabilities of the company computed, as regards liabilities which have not matured at the date of death, by reference to the value thereof at that date, and as regards contingent liabilities by reference to such estimation as appears to the Commissioners to be reasonable. It is suggested, therefore, that all liabilities are available as a deduction in a section 55 valuation.

When valuing a company's assets the possibility of a balancing charge may arise and this point was considered in Winter (Sutherland's Trustees) v. CIR (40 ATC 361). The result of this decision is that for share valuation purposes under section 55 of the 1940 Act, the Commissioners must make an estimation on the footing, that, as at the date of death, there is a contingent liability which would become an immediate liability if the company sold or otherwise ceased to trade with the relevant assets.

Relief for outstanding taxation liabilities was granted in section 30 (3), Finance Act 1954. The relevant section reads as follows:

'For the purpose of subsection (1) of section 50 of the Finance Act 1940, any liability of the company arising, or which may arise, after the death for taxation on income or profits shall be taken into account as if it were an actual but contingent liability at the date of death, in so far as the liability or its amount is referable to income or profits occurring before the death whether then realized or not.'

The relief granted by this section would appear to mean that, in the case of corporation tax, an amount may be deducted from the net assets value of the company for corporation tax outstanding in respect of the preceding accounting period, together with an estimate of the liability for corporation tax arising on the profits of the period up to the date of death.

Having dealt with one of the problems arising in the legislation contained in section 55, namely the ascertainment of liabilities, it is perhaps worth while to consider the other problem arising and this concerns the definition of a 'debenture'. The legal definition is contained in section 59 of the 1940 Act and is as follows:

'Debenture means, in relation to a company, any obligation of the company in respect of any loan capital issued by the company otherwise than as a consideration for a loan made to it in the ordinary course of the banking business or in respect of any debt incurred by the company:

- (a) for any money borrowed by the company otherwise than by way of temporary loan made in the ordinary course of a banking business; i.e., an overdraft;

- (b) for any transfer of capital assets made to the company by any person, unless the obligation is one resulting from a dealing with the person who transferred such assets to the company in, and on terms consistent with, the ordinary course of a business carried on by him; i.e., a supplier;
- (c) without consideration, or for consideration, the value of which to the company at the time when the debt was incurred was substantially less than the value at that time of the debt (including any premium thereon); or
- (d) where the debt was of such a nature that it would in the ordinary course of business and apart from some special arrangement, have carried interest at a rate which was either unreasonably high or unreasonably low'.

The reader will therefore appreciate that this particular section defines a debenture in such a way as makes it unrecognizable as the debenture with which the normal commercial world is familiar. It will be noted that there is no mention of any charge on the company's assets so that the normal conception of a debenture must be set aside. It would seem that the most likely situation that would be met in normal practice would be the case of loans made by the directors, which are a feature of a number of private companies. These will fall within the definition although, on the other hand, temporary credit balances for undrawn remuneration would be excluded.

The concept of apportionment of the net assets value to shares and debentures may, therefore, necessitate the value being apportioned to shareholders, debenture-holders, and individuals who have made loans to the company.

In reproducing the provisions of section 55, it was stated that some amendments were made by section 29 of the Finance Act 1954. Before passing on to the reliefs available in a section 55 valuation, it is necessary to deal with the amendments brought in by section 29. The section stipulated that a section 55 valuation was to apply if, during a continuous period of two years falling wholly within the seven years ending with his death, the deceased had powers equivalent to control of the company and also if, during the same period, the dividends declared by the company and the interest accruing due on debentures of the company were, as to amounts forming in the aggregate more than one-half of the total amount of the dividends and interest, for the benefit of the deceased. There is, however, an overriding proviso to the section which stipulates that the section only applies if one or other of the following conditions is satisfied:

- (a) that immediately after the deceased's death, a person having control or powers equivalent to control the company, either alone or in conjunction with his relatives, has a beneficial interest in possession in the shares or debentures;
- (b) that immediately before and after the death, the shares or debentures are held by the trustees of some trust who then have control of the company by virtue of shares in or debentures of the company held by them as trustees.

The Finance Act 1954

Let us now consider such reliefs as are available under a section 55 valuation.

Section 28 gives relief from estate duty by imposing a lower scale of duty on industrial hereditaments and plant and machinery used in and occupied for the purpose of the business. The relief does not apply to a section 55 valuation but to the estate duty applicable to that valuation. The relief is given by granting a reduction of 45 per cent to the rate applicable to the qualifying assets. Thus if the average rate of duty were 60 per cent the rate for these particular assets would be 60 per cent less 45 per cent of 60 per cent – i.e., (60 less 27) per cent, or 33 per cent.

As far as plant and machinery are concerned, the following points should be noted:

- (1) Where the asset is not exclusively used in the business (e.g., a motor-car) an apportionment has to be made as appears to the Commissioners to be just and reasonable. The income tax figure will normally be used.
- (2) Although there is no definition in the Act, plant and machinery will be accepted as for taxation purposes including items treated on a renewal basis, provided that they qualify for capital allowances.
- (3) Even if buildings do not qualify for relief, the contents may, as in the case of hotels where the contents are available for capital allowances purposes.

This reduction of 45 per cent in the effective rate of estate duty is extended to companies engaged in husbandry or forestry. The Finance Act 1925 introduced this relief for estates which included agricultural property. On such assets relief was given at 45 per cent of the average rate. Unfortunately, if the estate consisted of a company with agricultural property, there was no such relief but this was amended in section 28 of the Finance Act 1954.

'If the company is engaged in husbandry or forestry the duty shall be charged at the reduced rates at the time being in force for the purpose of section 23, Finance Act 1925.'

Unfortunately, however, even the reliefs in a section 55 valuation have their own particular peculiarities. One must consider the provisions of the Finance Act 1954, section 31, which deal with liabilities secured on specific assets.

Subsection (6) of this particular section states as follows:

'In arriving at the net value of any assets . . . to be charged at a reduced rate . . . any allowance for liabilities incurred for the purpose of the company shall be made as far as may be from the value of the assets used in the business other than such assets as aforesaid.'

Up to this point it is clear that the normal liabilities of a company (for example creditors and current tax) are to be deducted from other assets (for example stock and debtors) rather than from specified assets such as plant and machinery. In other words, a reduction of 45 per cent will be applied to all the specified assets as far as may be, but the particular section then continues:

'except that any allowance for secured liabilities shall be made from the value of assets which are, rather than the value of assets which are not, included in the security'.

This means that, if for example there is a bank overdraft secured specifically on assets which would normally rank for a reduction of 45 per cent of the overall rate, then the assets concerned must be reduced by the amount of the overdraft before that reduction is applied.

The strange results given by this subsection mean that if the specified assets amount to £50,000 and the overdraft £30,000:

- (a) if the overdraft is secured on the specified assets the relief will be on £20,000; and
- (b) if the overdraft is not so secured the relief will be on £50,000.

The sale of shares after death

One further relief is available in a section 55 valuation and that is contained in section 30 (1), Finance Act 1954. It is perhaps worth while to reproduce the full provisions of that particular legislation:

'Where any shares or debentures falling to be valued under section 55 of the Finance Act 1940 are sold within three years after the death by the persons accountable for the duty payable on the death or by the persons to whom they pass on the death and the Commissioners of Inland Revenue are satisfied:

- '(a) that no person concerned either as vendor or as having an interest in the proceeds of sale was a relative or any person concerned either as purchaser or as having an interest in the purchase; and
- '(b) that the sale was made at arm's length for a price freely negotiated at the time of sale; and
- '(c) that the price obtained for the shares or debentures on the sale, with any adjustment needed to take account of any difference in circumstances at the date of the sale and at the date of the death, was less than the value ascertained under the said section 55 of the shares or debentures sold; then for the purposes of estate duty on the death, that price, as so adjusted, shall be substituted for the value so ascertained of the shares or debentures sold.'

If such an arm's length sale is contemplated the executors can save themselves considerable time and expense by the avoidance of arguments concerning contingent liabilities and debentures, as already discussed, and goodwill which is discussed below.

Goodwill

According to the Finance Act 1940, section 59, 'assets' includes goodwill. While most professional advisers know well enough what is understood by goodwill, it has proved extremely difficult to arrive at a satisfactory definition. Goodwill in the commercial sense has been traced back to the Middle Ages, and an attempt was made by the research committee of a professional body of accountants to define goodwill as follows:

'Goodwill consists of those elements in business relationships which make a continuance of such relationships probable notwithstanding a change in the ownership of the business.'

The weakness of this definition is the omission of any reference to profits, whereas most accountants will agree that super-profit is an inevitable factor in any goodwill valuation. Super-profit in its turn has been defined as 'profits in excess of those required to provide an economic rate of remuneration for all labour and capital required in the business'.

A generation ago the goodwill factor was of prime importance but today it is generally recognized that goodwill is of little value. The majority of professional accountants recommend that goodwill should be written down to a nominal value of £1 as soon as possible if the balance sheet is to show a true and fair view of the position of the company at the relevant date.

This present approach to goodwill does not mean, however, that goodwill does not exist or is of no importance. It merely emphasizes that goodwill as one of the assets does not necessarily play a part in a share valuation. Goodwill does not arise until there are super-profits, but the calculation based on super-profits depends on assessing the value of the capital employed, that is to say the tangible assets representing that capital. Where this depends on fixed assets, the inflationary effect of the economy on the business community has played havoc with any assessment of goodwill based on super-profits. However, a valuation under section 55 on the value of tangible assets does in many cases reduce goodwill to a non-existent or negative figure.

Negative goodwill

The share valuation division recognize that if the trading record of a business is poor, then the assets as a whole are probably not worth the calculated total value of the tangible assets and this necessarily means that some or all of the assets are not worth the preliminary figures if the business is viewed as a going concern. The difference between the provisional net value of the assets and the price which would be realized for the business sold as a whole, is sometimes spoken of as 'badwill', but in commercial practice the difference is apportioned between the assets in a rather arbitrary fashion.

Goodwill generally

The valuation of goodwill is never easy, as has been pointed out by various judges in decided cases, and the smaller the company the more difficult the valuation becomes. An assets valuation arises only in certain circumstances and those circumstances are likely to be those where the driving force and founder of the business has died. The value of goodwill will, therefore, depend on the view taken of the future maintainable profit when this guiding hand has been removed. In many cases goodwill may be altogether absent and the valuer should never lose sight of the operative words which apply to goodwill as to any other asset: 'the price which it would fetch if sold in the open market at the time of death'.

The concept of the price/earnings ratio is useful in determining whether negative goodwill exists, for if an assets value is computed on the shares in the company applicable to the majority shareholding and then, as the secondary exercise, a suitable price/earnings ratio adopted which proves to be lower than the assets value, then prima facie negative goodwill is present. (To be concluded.)

LETTER FROM AMERICA

Artists Arise!

from Our New York Correspondent

If the Pergamon affair and the vote of August 14th have caused confusion among the ranks of the profession in Britain, the situation is not much better in America. Here, the unwinding of the Cornfeld saga (referred to in these columns on July 2nd, under the title 'Waiting on the Auditor's Words') is being followed with as much tension as is the Maxwell mystery in Britain.

Questions concerning the identity of beneficiaries of £10 million in loans from Investors Overseas Services remain largely unanswered. But with Mr Bernard Cornfeld still struggling to regain control from Sir Eric Wyndham White, the accounting practices formerly adopted by IOS are being subjected to increasingly hostile and incredulous comment.

One of the most intriguing problems that has so far surfaced is the sharp mark-up, in last year's accounts, in the value of mineral rights held by IOS in the Canadian Arctic. This decision has been defended on the grounds that the IOS mutual fund that held the rights succeeded in selling off some of them at the price reflected in the higher valuation adopted in the accounts.

A New York brokerage house expert in the management of unit trusts, the Arthur Lipper Corporation, was acting as adviser to IOS at the time when the storm blew up, and has since made a number of disparaging remarks on the usefulness of published accounts. A member of the Corporation has been quoted, for instance, as stressing that accounting is only an art and that earnings are a 'manufactured number'. (It must follow that financial success is far easier to achieve than company managements and their accountants have been led to believe!)

Quite apart from the IOS revelations, it seems that accountants are now held in low regard by many investors. A letter from a stockbroker published recently in the New York Times repeats the complaint that company reports are a poor guide to actual performance, and give investors too little protection against 'the surprise of yesterday's asset becoming tomorrow's liability'. The writer of the letter evidently believes that the investor would be aided by wider adoption of the growing American practice of publishing quarterly financial statements; and by the release of company income tax returns to stockholders.

These propositions – particularly the second of them – would probably cause the investor's confusion to be compounded. Yet most observers seem to agree that something should be done to shed more light for the benefit of investors lost in the darker crannies of the footnotes and supplements to annual reports.

Those outside the profession are already rushing forward with offers of assistance in making financial statements 'understandable'. As an example, a company called Shareholder Perspectives has been set up, which (for a fee) will prepare and publish any type of annual report to investors. It hints that, if the present situation goes unchecked, the Government will be forced to impose new rules calling upon companies to provide more intelligible information in their reports. The alternative, presumably, is for accountants to continue in their long-standing resolve to supply this type of information as a normal part of their responsibility to clients and shareholders.

Whether accounting be art or science, its practitioners are showing no enthusiasm for suggestions that those trained in other disciplines should spring to its defence in explaining what it really means.

International Management

by DOUGLAS GARBUTT, A.C.I.S., A.C.W.A., Dip.Ed.(Lond.)

The 17th Annual Conference for International University Contact for Management Education (IUC) was held this year in Bergen, Norway, from August 23rd to 26th, on the theme of 'Constraints and possibilities of participation and industrial democracy'. Representatives of management education institutes, industrial training, and commercial and industrial companies attended from most West European countries, from Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia, from Iran, and from the USA. A considerable number of participants were accompanied by their wives and families and a full and interesting programme was provided for them.

THE theme of the conference was certainly topical and it was interesting to learn of the different ways in which the problems are conceived in different countries and the corresponding differences in the approaches to the problem of participation. Professor Einar Thorsrud described an experiment in participation which had been conducted in Norway in co-operation with the Tavistock Institute. The research was supported by both employers and trade unions.

In Norway the trade unions are strong and allied closely with the Social Democratic party. Rising standards of education, the achievement of welfare objectives outside industry and the growth of international combines created demands in the labour movement for improved income, job safety and, on the far left, for the equalization of power among the major partners in industry. Given the long tradition of institutional co-operation in Scandinavia, it was possible for trade unions and employers to get together to consider the problems of participation.

The most obvious solution was to give some representation for workers on the boards of companies. This was unsuccessful since employee representatives have little to contribute to the board and tend to lose contact with the workers they represent. It is more important to get the democratic handling of day-to-day problems within the company and provision of adequate machinery for negotiating on specific issues.

Personal initiative

When the research showed this in 1963-64, it was agreed to initiate a new phase of research into the problems of daily participation in the work life of companies. It was found that the more the individual was able to exercise control over his task and relate his efforts to those of his fellows the more committed he became to his job. Personal initiative and creativity was released in a democratic climate but there was no simple technique that could be applied in all conditions to bring about these changes: in some types of production job enlargement is effective, in others the development of autonomous work groups is effective.

Professor Thorsrud made the point that this type of research requires both support from industry itself and the involvement of the unions and employers in the evaluation of the results: only if the representatives have full access to the scientific information and are able to influence the interpretation which is put on them will results be ultimately acceptable. It goes without saying that such influence requires a strong personality on the side of the social researcher since he himself must be the guardian of the scientific approach.

Workers' participation

It may be expected that the German approach to participation in industry would be somewhat different from that in Norway. Mr G. Triesch, Director of the Deutsches Industrieinstitut, Cologne, described the system of co-determination as introduced into the Federal Republic of Germany under the Plant Organization Law of 1952. This requires employers and works councils to co-operate with each other and forbids industrial conflicts between them. The council and employer meet at least monthly, but in practice more frequently, and even organizations with as few as five permanent employees are required to have a works council. The council has a right of co-determination in a wide range of decisions, both economic and social, and employers complain that this may delay vital decisions and affect economic performance.

In addition to the works council there is a plant assembly of all employees and the law also requires that employees must participate on the board of directors of all enterprises, not merely companies. In private industry this is up to one-third of the board, but in mining, iron and steel the board includes 50 per cent employee representatives. This necessitates the appointment of an independent chairman who may decide on disputed issues. The law also requires the appointment of a labour director who serves on the executive committee of the company.

Despite the complex and comprehensive structural provision for participation the sad fact is that the first wave of wildcat strikes in West Germany occurred precisely in those industries where participation is most strongly provided for. There is therefore considerable concern over improving the effectiveness of participation and the German Employers Association have presented proposals for extending the Plant Organization Law, so that every employee will be able to express his opinion on problems affecting his own work. It is interesting that the Germans, therefore, seem to be coming to the same conclusion as the Norwegians: provision for remote representation of workers is not the best means of securing their participation in enterprises.

The Yugoslav model

Professor Dr S. Han, of the University of Subotica, Yugoslavia, described in some detail the Yugoslav approach to industrial democracy. In the case of Yugoslavia her different philosophy and the expropriation of private property has led to an experiment in self-government of working people based on the social ownership of the means of production.

Since 1953 the working collectives in Yugoslavia have been managed directly through their workers' council. Each working unit decides the questions of its own conduct including the distribution of income between the members, the social amenities to be provided and the procurement of work. A proportion of earnings must be ear-marked for the community as prescribed by law but otherwise the workers may distribute the profits as remuneration or build up a fund for common use, or build apartment blocks, improve vocational training and so forth.

Remuneration is usually based on some kind of objective measure agreed beforehand. The community retains the right to suspend self-government if it appears that the collective is not acting responsibly towards socially earned property. The director of an enterprise may not be elected to the workers' council although he takes part in its work. Equally, he may not be chairman of the management board although he has an ex-officio right to membership. The director has a high degree of independence although he is ultimately answerable to the workers' council. In discussion Professor Han disclaimed any idea that the Yugoslavs had completely solved the problems of industrial democracy and participation although he felt strongly that the measures had proved themselves as suitable bases for operation and that it was no longer fair to describe them as an experiment.

Professor Dr M. van de Vall, of the State University of New York at Buffalo, contrasted the American provision with the approach in Europe. During the Second World War, the United States had 5,000 joint plant committees roughly similar to the British joint production committees, but whereas this system of joint co-operation seems to have been extended in Europe, in the United States it has largely been abandoned. Both unions and management were reluctant to maintain the joint consultation provision partly because these measures were seen by the unions as a form of employer-unionism.

Joint consultation

Professor van de Vall sees the origins of European and American approaches to joint consultation or human relations as being political and religious in Europe with the unions receiving social support with latent resistance from management. The United States relations are based on scientific management and economic influences and management receives the support with latent resistance from the unions. The goals in Europe are a quest for workers' security and accommodation and co-operation between workers and management and this leads to changes in the structure of control in industrial organization. In the United States the goal is to satisfy management's quest for efficiency through a sense of identification between workers and management.

In the United States industrial democracy is predominantly defined in psychological terms and change is sought through persuasion, multiple management and T-groups. The effects of this are possibly in Europe that labour's power is strengthened and is able to curb management's power to make decisions largely through co-management procedures. In the United States the effect is that management's power is strengthened by the delegation of minor decisions to subordinate levels and therefore an increasing acceptance of management decisions. In discussion Professor van de Vall pointed out that the structure of industrial relations is an intervening variable between the social structure and the economic performance and industrial relations, so that the way a particular structure operates will depend very much on the underlying social relations.

The underlying social structure is important; one question was how many of the German worker representatives (who number almost 200,000), had moved over into management. It did not surprise the European participants when the answer was 'Almost none'. Yet the relatively classless attitudes of the Americans would have led them to believe that men in positions of responsibility on company boards would show some ability and would be recruited to management.

Mr T. P. Lyons, a director of Glyn Williams Bank Ltd, recognized the importance of trade union bargaining as a source of industrial democracy and compared the resolution of conflict in this area to the party political democratic system. Nevertheless, his paper concentrated mainly on the provision of worker representatives and of joint consultation at various levels within organizations. He argued that multi-tiered joint consultation structures tend to become less effective at the higher level other than as a medium for communication of decisions. He considered the solution to be to integrate the various hierarchical levels within the organization with the joint consultation procedures and therefore suggested that workers should be consulted at one level above their position within the hierarchy. This would confine a worker's attention in a common-sense way to the area within which he is an expert and the immediately superior level in which management policy is determined which will affect his own sphere of operation.

Mr Lyons also touched on the dangers of a recruitment system which is based on formal education and which may close opportunities to operatives who have individual ability and talent but who have not been selected by the normal educational system. It is important to keep open the route from the operative level to the top in business. Eventually participation comes back not to abstract structures but to day-to-day attitudes towards work and other employees.

Use of information

Peter L. M. van Berkel, managing director of Berenschot-Diebold NV, spoke on the problems of information processing in an industrial democracy. He pointed out that the advent of sophisticated data gathering and processing techniques tends to cause dehumanizing of the data and decision processes. The right of the providers of capital to an enterprise to information of the conduct of the enterprise is incorporated in the role of the independent auditor. In recent times we have recognized the right of government to information concerning the operations of enterprises for local, regional, national, and international purposes. More recently we have had pressures from consumers to influence the decisions of management. Ralph Nader has had an important influence on General Motors policies and at the last shareholders meeting there was a proposal to appoint consumer representatives on the board, and, although the proposal was defeated, it shows the trend.

Industrial democracy and participation of labour in the enterprise obviously suggests that the unions and workers will increasingly demand access to information concerning the enterprise. This information will be used as a basis for influencing the policies of the enterprise and may in some case result in constraints on managerial decision-making. At the same time the accumulation of data by enterprises on individuals requires some procedures for the protection of those individuals against disclosure of data to insiders and outsiders. A distinction must be drawn between factual and judgemental information. Whereas access to the former may be relatively free, access to the latter should be restricted to those qualified to use it.

In the Sixth Berenschot Memorial Lecture, Dr J. A. Hendriks, of the Dutch Productivity Council, discussed the problems of the professional manager and re-emphasized the need to retain the role of the manager as a decision-maker. We must select men of suitable age so that they may perform during their most active periods; we must secure effective management development so that men may reach the appropriate level suitable to their abilities; we must create the conditions under which management within a company will be able to work creatively and effectively; we must ensure that the conditions under which a company works are such that it can meet fair competition and execute necessary actions and participate in various industrial contexts without being too highly subject to the interference of the State and its policy.

A valuable feature of the conference was a number of reports of research in progress. Professor Fischbacher, of the University of Neuchatel, presented a paper on the limits of participation in company decisions. Professor Honko and Mr L. Ahlstedt presented an integrated national plan for management education in Finland. This is the first attempt to outline the requirements for that country. Professor S. M. Klein, J. Luytjes and D. Schaupp described an investigation into participative management in the United States which suggests that variations in participations are associated with system levels of satisfaction rather than with perception of motivation. The results suggest that positive benefits can accrue in terms of motivation if participation is on a group rather than an individual basis.

Corporate utilities

Professor Ralph Swalm, of Syracuse University, described an interesting attempt to establish a corporate utility function. He was successful in persuading foremen that their corporation could benefit if there were a uniform perception of the corporate attitude towards risks. But he was unsuccessful in persuading the president of the company that the effort to define corporate risk attitudes was worth while. Mr A. W. M. Teulings, of Leiden University, discussed the constraints and possibilities of the Dutch works council and I presented a paper on the British Industrial Training Act, which reported both on the structure and on some of the results of computer simulation of the levy/grant mechanism.

During the conference the annual general meeting of IUC was held and it was decided to establish national committees to raise finance which, in the past, has come mainly from the Dutch section (even if from Anglo-Dutch companies). IUC has shown the need for more international contact in management education and provides with the European Association of Training Centres a suitable forum for academics and for interested industrialists.

Current Law

Bank's Right of Set-Off

THE judgment of Roskill, J, in Halesowen Presswork and Assemblies Ltd v. Westminster Bank Ltd, noted under 'Current affairs' on November 20th, 1969, has been reversed by a majority of the Court of Appeal.

At the material time, the company's No. 1 account was overdrawn by £11,339, having been frozen at that figure for some weeks, and its No. 2 account was in credit by £8,634. By agreement, the bank was to maintain the two accounts separately unless circumstances materially changed.

Lord Denning, MR, and Winn, LJ, (Buckley, LJ, dissenting) held that when notice of a creditors' meeting was given on May 20th, 1968, this was a change of circumstances which would have entitled the bank to terminate the previous agreement. The bank did not, however, terminate it but for their own benefit allowed it to continue – by accepting payment of the company's trading receipts into the No. 2 account, and debiting interest on the overdrawn No. 1 account to No. 2 account – and they could not thereafter seek to combine the two accounts at the moment of liquidation. The liquidator's appeal should succeed.

Companies: Oppression of Minorities

SECTION 210 of the Companies Act 1948 gives the Court a wide discretion to deal with cases of oppression where to wind up the company would unfairly prejudice the complainants, but where the circumstances would otherwise render it just and equitable for the company to be wound up.

L was a director and 50 per cent shareholder of a company whose articles provided that (a) directors' remuneration should be determined in general meeting, (b) the personal representatives of a deceased shareholder should be entitled to his shares and (c) any person becoming entitled to a share on a member's death should have the right to be registered as a member, and be entitled to the deceased member's dividends and other advantages. L died in 1953, and at various dates thereafter the continuing directors purported to pass resolutions at directors' meetings (a) to issue further shares to themselves (which had the effect of reducing the value of L's estate), (b) to regulate their own remuneration and (c) to delete from the accounts a sum of £2,936 owing to L's estate.

In 1961, L's administrators were entered on the company's register of members, at their own request, but no notice of general meetings was ever given to them. Between 1961 and 1969 there were abortive negotiations for a settlement, and eventually in 1969 the administrators applied for an order under section 210.

In the Chancery Division, Pennycuik, J, criticized the delay in bringing the matter before the Court, but said that the petitioners had never given up their claim and were entitled to bring it as members. The conduct complained of was oppressive: in particular, the directors' power to issue shares must be exercised in good faith for the benefit of the company, and the directors' resolution to fix their own remuneration was ultra vires. The Court's discretion under section 210 was unlimited so as to bring the matters complained of to an end, and he would order the buying out of one faction by the other on a basis to afford compensation for the injury inflicted by the oppressors.

National Insurance Acts: Travelling in Course of Employment

THE claimant was employed by the Department of Social Security and part of his duties consisted in visiting people in their homes. He was allowed a discretion in allocating his working time between his office and his visiting programme, and was expected to arrange his visits in the most convenient and economical order.

On April 18th, 1969, he had arranged such a series of visits and was injured in a street accident whilst on a direct route from his home to the site of his first appointment. He claimed to have suffered an 'industrial accident', but the local insurance officer argued that the claimant's employment did not commence until he reached his first appointment: until that time, he was travelling to duty and was not on duty.

The Commissioner (Mr Hilary Magnus) found for the claimant. His employment included travelling in order to pay official visits, and he was properly engaged in doing that. It was wrong to equate his case with that of an office or factory worker who had to report to a defined place of work. Nor was it analogous with a previous decision (ref. R(I) 2/67) in the case of a home help whose hours of work at each of several different addresses had been specified by her employers in advance. If the claimant had travelled firstly from his home to his office and thence to his first appointment, this would have served no purpose of his employment, and would have wasted time and money in making a detour. It was unnecessary to consider what might have been the position if the claimant had lived at a distance from the area of his visits, and if the accident had occurred outside his working hours.

[It is suggested that the decision in this case might be equally appropriate to that of an audit clerk visiting clients' premises in similar circumstances.]

Changes in Company Image

DRESS, it is said with some validity, denotes personality and character. The extrovert dresses flamboyantly, the introvert soberly.

Company reports have the same capacity for implying character — more particularly, changes in company reports have the capacity to indicate changes in company character — or image, in the modern jargon.

Take UGI for example. The initials probably mean little to a substantial majority of the readers of this column. UGI stands for United Gas Industries which, again, hardly stirs the processes of recognition to any real degree.

But one look at the latest UGI report would convince anyone but the most jaundiced of readers that the company is busy with its image and with building up a more forceful business from sober origins. That in itself is perhaps an exaggeration, but there is certainly a change in UGI as distinct from United Gas Industries.

It is necessary to attempt to describe the report which in size is 'sideways' foolscap, and comes in a hazy blue cover with the company initials in black on joined diamond-shaped blocks. In the bottom right corner appears the more conventional 'United Gas Industries Ltd Directors Report and Accounts'.

Section reports

The inside cover 'contents' page is brown, and the next five white glossy pages contain the chairman's statement,

Colonel G. W. Raby, and a colour photograph of him. Mr R. Berry, deputy chairman has two pages, including photograph in colour, to report 'The Changing Face of UGI'. The remaining glossy pages of the front section contain the detail of the board, group headquarters and the like, and an organization chart.

Then come the directors' report and the accounts on light brown matt paper with black print for narrative and current figures, and darker brown for headings, rules and comparative figures. This section ends with the ten-year financial summary and the names, locations and activities of main subsidiaries.

The final glossy section contains reports from the heads of the two main divisions – Precision Engineering Division and Appliance Division – and, finally, Mr W. R. Shepherd, F.C.A., group finance director, has an explanatory page to himself complete with colour picture in which he is smiling as if without a care in the world.

In the modern idiom, the page headed 'Finance' opens with 'Finance Director of the Group is 44-year-old Roy Shepherd' and goes on to recount that Mr Shepherd 'moved to the field of management accounting', joined UGI in 1956 as accountant of the Furnace Division, and

The increase in issued ordinary share capital was the aggregate of shares issued to complete the liability to former shareholders of Berry's Electric Magicoal Ltd. and £3,400 issued in consideration of a subsidiary company purchased during the year.

Rockwell Manufacturing Company of Pittsburgh (Rockwell) hold £334,000 of the ordinary shares of United Gas Industries Ltd. (U.G.I.). By resolution passed at an Extraordinary General Meeting of the ordinary shareholders of U.G.I. held on 23rd February, 1970, Rockwell has the right to subscribe at any time before 16th May, 1972 further Ordinary Shares of 5s. 0d. each, at approximately 25s. 0d. per share, sufficient to provide Rockwell with a total holding of 35 per cent. of the enlarged issued ordinary share capital of U.G.I. following such subscription. In the event of the U.G.I. issued ordinary share capital being increased otherwise than by the exercise of this option or by a rights issue, Rockwell has the right to subscribe at the then current market price (as defined in the relative Letters of Agreement) sufficient Ordinary Shares to maintain that percentage of the U.G.I. ordinary share capital held by it under these arrangements immediately prior to such increase.

Capital Expenditure at 31st March, 1970 authorised but not contracted for, was £1,116,000 (1969—£920,000). Commitments at 31st March, 1970 not provided for in these Accounts were approximately £117,000 (1969—£281,000).

On 24th March, 1970 United Gas Industries Ltd. (U.G.I.) made an offer to buy the whole of the issued share capital of The British Thermostat Company Ltd. The offer was made unconditional on 15th April, 1970, as at which date U.G.I. became liable to issue as consideration:—

in turn became group cost accountant, group chief accountant, and now group finance director.

Changes

In quotation marks, which presumably indicate Mr Shepherd's words, it is stated that 'The group operates a modern integrated financial and cost accounting system' which includes, inter alia, financial planning by three- and five-year forecasts prepared within main board policy framework, detailed preparation of annual budgets, standard costing in all major divisions, 'a sophisticated cash control system' and the investigation with the aid of divisional study teams of new techniques of forward planning and management accounting. The methods employed 'ensure that accounting information is made available sufficiently quickly to provide effective management control'.

Mr Shepherd has had to cope with considerable changes within the organization, so much so that Colonel Raby in his report has to refute suggestions that 'UGI is tending to become a conglomerate'. He explains that up to the early part of last year United Gas Industries had three main products - gas meters, electricity meters and gas fires, with virtually two customers only.

Since then the group has doubled in size and now includes names such as Berry Magicoal and British Thermostat. Through the acquisition of those two companies, UGI now has a wide range of gas and electrical appliances and unlimited customers for them, with an extensive range of customers for control and measurement products.

The name

Future expansion will continue to be based on development of new products and by taking over companies with complementary activities. On the latter point, UGI policy is to dispose of any ill-fitting 'appendages' that might be acquired in the process.

Last January the company made a bid for the Venner group but withdrew when a rival was prepared to make an offer which the UGI board considered excessive. In the following March a successful bid was negotiated for The British Thermostat Company. Another recent developmen

(c) Berry Magicoal Ltd. properties were valued on a going concern basis by Chamberlain & Willows as at 31st March, 1969. The resultant surplus of £323,000, which has been transferred to Capital Reserve, is the aggregate of the £222,000 surplus over cost shown above and £101,000 depreciation written back. is the creation, with Rockwell Manufacturing Company of America, of an international company operating in Europe and the Middle East to design, manufacture and market a range of high and low pressure gas meters and gas control equipment.

In view of the developments of the past two years, the board's feeling is that the company's name is becoming progressively restrictive. The name United Gas Industries no longer indicates the purpose or the products of the company and a more appropriate company name is being considered. Anyone with any experience of trying to worry out a new and acceptable name for a company will extend the fullest sympathy to the UGI directors in their task.

Newcomer

As a 'newcomer to UGI', Mr R. Berry, who came in when Berry Magicoal was acquired early in 1969, says how impressed he is 'with the forward-looking view of the group and the methods it is pursuing'. He points out that in 1965 UGI was investing a mere £50,000 in research and development but that this year the figure will be in the region of £600,000.

Over 35 per cent of the Precision Engineering Division is represented by Smith Meters, and industrial and domestic gas meters account for 80 per cent of Smith's turnover. The remainder of the division is largely represented by the British Thermostat group's activities in autocontrols, aircraft controls and industrial bellows.

In the Appliance Division there are four sections: Berry Magicoal, making electric and gas space heaters and water heaters, electric fires and storage radiators; the Robinson Willey gas appliance organization; Link Installations, launched last year to exploit the group's products in the central heating market; and a components section making brass fittings and wooden cabinets.

Because of the major changes in the group, the statistical pattern of the ten-year summary is not of immediate impact other than to show that UGI is a vastly different proposition from what it was three years ago. But the summary content is sound, down to salient operating percentages.

Altogether a report with urgency in it, strongly presented with considerable style and impact.

Passed By

FIRTH CLEVELAND was a conglomerate before anyone thought of the word, even before anyone thought of 'industrial holding company'. But the 1960s, which was the decade of growth for many industrial groups, passed Firth Cleveland by. The ten-year record included in the recently issued accounts has a decidedly 'ungrowth' look to it.

Issued ordinary capital has remained constant at £3,733,000 through the decade, which must be something of a record in itself, but total funds employed have risen from £13,541,000 to £24,536,000. But whereas in 1960 Firth Cleveland earned pre-tax profits of £3,067,000, it only earned £2,048,000 last year. Between times, profits were back to only £1,720,000 in 1962 and rallied to £3,565,000 by 1965.

There has been a continual tussle between the industrial and retail sides of the group and only in rare years have the two functioned well at the same time. 'Civic' is the main name in the retail division and even after many previous reports of regrouping and reorganization in this division, the latest report admits that 'much remains to be done to bring these activities into satisfactory profits, but the management changes made and the programmes which have been speedily implemented should result in progress improvement'.

Last year there was a loss of £77,000 on retail turnover of £13,423,000 against a previous year profit of £877,000 on £14,910,000. Total group turnover was £48,618,000, including £5,573,000 of inter-company sales.

Profits from Waste

THERE is a nice economy of words in Mrs Joan Agar's statement to shareholders in Leonard Leigh Interests, a Birmingham-based company concerned with coal and coke contractors, builders' merchants, sand and gravel quarrying and effluent disposal. On the last named activity, Mrs Agar says 'We commenced trading in 1968; last year we made £25,690 and this year £63,004.'

Then Mrs Agar goes on to recount a development which starts off the thought processes. 'We are expanding', she says, 'by researching and development into the recovery of products before their disposal.' At what stage does waste become waste?

The answer presumably is that waste is a more readily disposable commodity if, so to speak, it is caught early on and before it gets mixed up with other waste. This is suggested by Mrs Agar's statement that 'recovery of products before their disposal' will be 'beneficial to industry and . . . commercially profitable'.

Turnover of £407,300 in waste disposal brought the past year's profit of £63,004, whereas turnover of £2,449,600 in the builders' merchants and sand and gravel quarrying sector brought profits of only £34,187.

An 'exceptional bad debt' of £23,600 was incurred in the builders' merchants division and after allowing £10,620 of tax relief, a net £12,980 is deducted from profit after tax 'to avoid undue distortion of the results for the year'.

Fire Insurance

INSURANCE is always too expensive until, too late, it is made to look remarkably cheap. But the insurance industry is becoming much more demanding in its requirements. Hicking Pentecost & Co, the Nottingham textile group, found that out last year.

Mr A. J. Pentecost, the chairman, reports to shareholders that at the beginning of the year (presumably the financial year beginning April 1969) 'Lloyds gave us very short notice that they were not prepared to renew 100 per cent of our fire insurance in spite of the previous three years being virtually claim free.'

Only one company, Mr Pentecost reports, would act as leading office and 'in addition to an increased basic rate they are imposing a penalty rate until sprinklers are installed in the three biggest factories'.

The final insurance premium figure was only agreed towards the end of the year and 'represents an increase on the previous annual premium of £37,000 or 100 per cent'.

CITY NOTES

QUIET' and 'indecisive' are two words cropping up regularly in stock-market commentaries. They are likely to be repeated for some time ahead according to investment reviews coming out of stockbroking offices. Brokers still put forward a variety of industrial shares for investment consideration, but to judge by the volume of business being recorded in the stock-market as a whole, none of the recommendations carry any force when it comes to reviving interest or demand.

In stockbrokers' investment analyst offices there is much research, much suggestion and much more regret. The work that goes into preparing 'surveys in depth' of industrial companies is ill-rewarded in terms of business attracted. There is no damper squib than an investment recommendation in a dead stock-market. On a lively market almost any recommendation will command business. On a dead one nothing happens.

The only thing for stockbrokers to do is to be prepared to sweat out a further period of restricted trading. There are already signs, however, that the present period of low-level business has lasted long enough for the familiar running down of staff to begin.

The uncomfortable feeling is that conditions may get worse before they get better.

ONE of the consequences of a dead stock-market is that investment money is searching for new homes. Under conditions of intense inflation, equities are proving no protection for capital. Goods rather than shares are being bought. The antiques trade in particular is attracting money that a stock-market would normally attract under inflationary conditions.

Stamps and coins also have their supporters, although in the former area there are some questionable offers being put before the public. For the time being the stock-market may well continue to be the loser in the attraction of money even though there are indications that some of the more venturesome unit trust managements are giving new offers a try.

Property bonds, rather than unit trusts, are the more likely to take the eye of the small investor now. The decision of the Tyndall Trust management to launch a property bond operation is definitely a sign of changing times in the attraction of investment funds.

ASPECIAL committee of the London Stock Exchange Council has rejected the Heasman Report suggestion of a ten-day rolling account system for stock-market operation in favour of a one-week account. The rolling account system, the committee considers, would be a deterrent to the short-term operator who is useful not only as a source of turnover but also as a warning light of near future price movements. It would make jobbing more complicated and possibly slower where large deals were concerned, and financial control would be made more difficult.

On the assumption that the Heasman recommendations on documentation will be introduced, the committee proposes a one-week account settled during the third week after the end of the account, with 'new time' business allowed during the whole of the preceding week.

In other words, during one week speculators would be able to deal for settlement on the basis of the following week's account and would be assured of a two-week run for their money.

THE new policy of conserving reserves and not spending them unduly on supporting sterling in the foreign exchange market imposes a certain amount of strain on the market's nervous system. The recent exercise which allowed bears to sell sterling almost down to the 2·3810 level and then twisted the bears' tails to the extent of getting the rate almost up to 2·39 the following day, was without doubt expertly achieved – but so is a high-wire act without a safety net.

Letters

The Future of the Profession

SIR, - Now that the scheme for integration is dead, it is amusing to read the various letters in your columns stating what should now be done - e.g., that the ICA should think again, and that the non-chartered bodies should 'gang' together to form a larger body.

Very interesting, I must say, but let us not kid ourselves. As far as the ICA in E & W is concerned their body is a closed shop and can only be entered via articulated service, which is hard luck on the professionally trained certified accountant.

As for the possibility of the other accountancy bodies forming one large institute, pigs might equally fly! There could be too much at stake now that full integration is dead. The ACCA, for example, has BOT recognition; the IMTA has its own charter, whereas the ICWA has neither, although a highly respected body. Nor can I see the presidents of the various institutes holding sneak meetings behind the back of the ICA president. No sir, we can forget integration in any form for many years to come. It is regrettable and I wholeheartedly agree with your correspondent, A. J. Adams, A.C.A. (September 10th issue) that never again can we take the ICA seriously.

For my own part I would like to see the ICWA shed itself of that antiquated name 'Cost and Works' and call itself what it really is, 'The Institute of Management Accountants', as management accounting involves most aspects of accountancy (including costing).

Yours faithfully,

Rochester, Kent. R. G. BASSETT, F.C.W.A., A.C.I.S.

SIR, - The committee of the North Staffordshire Society of Chartered Accountants at a meeting held this week discussed the position arising on the integration vote and I have been asked to forward a resolution, which was passed unanimously, for the consideration of Council. The resolution is as follows:

'That the vote on integration appears to show that the Council is not in touch with the general body of members and it should therefore be enlarged to include a greater cross-section of the members and that all members of the Council should be elected directly from the annual meeting of district societies and branches so that each member of the Institute can feel that he is directly represented on the Council.'

I have forwarded a copy of the resolution to the Secretary of the Institute and I have been instructed by my committee to forward a copy to district societies and branches and to the accountancy press for information.

Yours faithfully,

N. E. DUNNING,

Hon. Secretary,

THE NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE

SOCIETY OF CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS.

Stoke-on-Trent.

SIR, - The recent merger proposals showed nine bodies of accountants co-operating under great difficulties. May I make a plea that in spite of the merger proposals not being successful, efforts be made to try to continue this co-operation for the good of the profession and everyone concerned.

Yours faithfully,

Tynemouth. FRED. W. SIMPSON, A.C.I.S., A.A.I.A.

Overseas Appointments

SIR, - May I offer an extension to the ideas offered by 'Expatriate Accountant' in the September 3rd issue of your excellent magazine.

I should be pleased to hear from anyone who has any questions to ask about conditions of work, cost of living, etc., in Canada. I will give an unbiased and honest opinion of my experience of two happy years here, which I am sure will give a better guide to prospective immigrants than any glowing tourist brochure, enthusiastic agency or immigration official.

Yours faithfully,

Willowdale, Toronto, Canada. J. R. C. SYKES, C.A.

[We shall be glad to forward any letters to Mr Sykes. - Editor.]

Income Taxes and Inflation

SIR, - I am compelled to question the opening paragraph of Mr J. M. Cope's article in your issue of September 3rd on 'Income Taxes and Inflation'.

Inflation is not accepted as a permanent feature of economic life - by the ordinary individual. It may be so accepted by economists who will tinker about with symptoms of the general malaise affecting the world today, instead of looking at the disease itself.

Let us be quite clear about the disease and its cause. The disease, is 'galloping inflation'. This illness is aggravated by taxation, however described, direct or indirect. The cause of the disease, here in Great Britain and elsewhere, is the maladministration of successive governments in pursuing unsound financial policies.

The cure, and there is a cure, is to cut government expenditure ruthlessly.

Any rational American will admit, in private conversation, that the cause of 'galloping inflation' in the USA is the pursuit of the abortive Vietnam war and the soaring costs of the mind-boggling space programme.

In Great Britain, over the tea-cups, it would be admitted that the cause is the fantastic costs of the so-called 'welfare state', topped up by such foolish extravagances as the fateful Concorde project.

It is not necessary to have an 'index of inflation' (your contributor), a 'crawling peg' exchange rate (Samuel Brittan), 'export-led' growth (Professor Kaldor), or any other esoteric economic finesse, but a good, sound financial policy which recognizes that what is true of an individual is also true of a nation, a group of nations, the world – namely, that if you cannot afford it, you cannot have it, unless someone else can be persuaded to go without it.

Enoch Powell's Morecambe speech last year really deserved more serious attention than it received. In a theoretical budget (the result of putting together the budgets for several years), he demonstrated with limpid lucidity and arithmetical accuracy, that Government expenditure, in this country, could be cut by over £2,000 million per annum. It could be done. It should be done.

Yours faithfully,

Northwood, Middx.

D. A. TRIGWELL.

Confidentiality of Business Statistics

SIR, – May I refer to your leading article in The Accountant of August 27th, 1970, which seems to suggest that the degree of confidentiality at present attached to the statistics business and industry are required to give, should be diminished.

Most of these are given as the result of statute and I believe it would be the thin end of a possibly very large wedge if information provided was to be used in any way that could operate against the interests of the provider – especially since he has no option under the law.

There is always the argument that administration will be eased and results quicker if regard for confidentiality was not so stringent but I believe it right to say most in industry regard the statistical returns they give as a nuisance of no value to them and would be most disturbed if they felt that even their anonymity was in jeopardy.

Yours faithfully,

Solihull, Warwicks.

The Use of Management Information

Cost Accountants' Summer School at Cambridge

MEMBERS of The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants assembled again at St Catharine's College, Cambridge, this week for their 21st annual summer school. About 120 delegates attended, and heard papers from eight distinguished speakers on the theme 'The Use of Management Information'.

Analytical approach to problem solving

The speaker on this subject was Mr I. G. S. Groundwater, Secretary, Joint Diploma in Management Accounting, who described a formal analytical procedure for solving problems or making decisions which depends almost entirely on the use of management information – the identification of the information needed, its collection, analysis and interpretation, and its use in the formulation of the solution to the problem under review. The procedure is simply an orderly method of reasoning leading logically to the optimum solution or decision, and can be applied to big or small problems in large or small organizations.

The critics of analytical method argue that because it is logical, it is inevitably predictable, restrictive, unimaginative and indeed destructive. They argue that a creative constructive approach is preferable and cite various methods of generating ideas as being more likely to produce a good answer to the problem than an analysis of it. In Mr Groundwater's view, there is no conflict between these two approaches and they should be complementary.

Return on capital employed

The second speaker, Mr E. B. Bishop, F.C.W.A., J.DIP.M.A., F.C.I.S., examined the weaknesses of the concept of 'return on capital employed' (ROCE). Used in isolation, ROCE is inadequate for planning and control. It has its place in the managerial tool kit, but it is a multi-purpose tool rather than an all-purpose one. As with any set of tools, the user must select the right one for his purpose and be sure that he knows how to use it properly.

It is, for instance, of little use to know that a variance exists between target and performance if there is no ready means of investigating the causes. The proper use of ROCE for performance control is as the apex of a pyramid of subsidiary ratios – net profits to sales, cost of goods to sales, rate of working capital turnover and others – which, taken together, will throw light into the recesses of the business.

Used alone as a target of performance, ROCE tends to inhibit growth, as the attempted maintenance of a high rate of return, without regard to the cost of capital, may lead to the passing over of opportunities which could have contributed to worth-while and profitable growth. Mr Bishop also cautioned his audience that the currency units or quantities which go to make up a set of ratios should be made clear, as percentages alone can be seriously misleading if quoted out of their context.

Behavioural science

Dr R. J. Beishon discussed 'Information flow and managers' decisions' from the standpoint of a behavioural scientist.

The human being is an exceedingly complex machine, and our understanding of its functioning and operation is rudimentary: we still have relatively little understanding of how the human brain works, or how people will react to changes. There is a very real danger in the introduction of sophisticated information systems which may have well-developed technical programmes, but which fail to realize that they can only work in conjunction with human beings. The system is not 'just another technical innovation' which people will, or must, adapt to.

The reality of management may be very different from the textbook presentation of actions carried out in an impartial, dispassionate and rational manner, with various mathematical and technical aids toward the optimum decision in each case. The man within the manager is a human being in a human environment, with his own personal aims, aspirations and prejudices. He is almost always in competition with others, and is constantly involved in interaction with other people who may be unco-operative or actively obstructive, and who do not appear to him to behave either rationally or predictably.

To the behavioural scientist, 'management' is regarded as what managers actually do, rather than what they should do, and 'information' is interpreted widely enough to include all the signals and data which a manager receives in the course of his day, whether they are apparently relevant to the work or not. The process by which a manager collects information is often rather obscure and devious.

The manager himself may not be consciously aware how he reaches his decisions, or why he makes a good decision rather than a bad one, and in a situation where so little is known about how a man actually does his job it appears difficult, and indeed dangerous, to make arbitrary decisions about the information which he is – and, perhaps more significant, is not – going to need. Management is still rightly regarded as a peculiarly human skill, and whilst others can aid the manager, he cannot be replaced by a set of rules for action, or by mathematical equations.

Operational research approach

Dr Beishon was followed by Dr J. A. Carruthers, who took as his title 'Corporate modelling and control'. He recalled that he had addressed the London branch of the ICWA in 1965 on 'Models, mathematics and management' and the relationship between operational research and the management accountant, and suggested that it might be instructive to see what changes had taken place in the intervening five years.

Put simply, the ultimate aim of a corporate modelling system is to present to the user a projection of the company's annual statements, such as the balance sheet and profit and loss account, for each of several periods, usually years ahead. The typical model is a series of information 'bricks', with the topmost brick of the whole pyramid as a consolidated summary of the whole corporation.

Dr Carruthers conceded that corporate modelling systems based on multi-user computer systems, as calculations of continuously variable budgets, might cost more (rather than less) than existing estimating and budgeting systems. The compensating advantages would be the quicker evaluation of a greater number of alternatives, and tighter monitoring under an up-to-date relevant plan.

Design of business systems

The next paper of the series was contributed by Mr V. A. J. Gifford, D.L.C., C.ENG., M.I.P.E., M.INST.M.C., F.S.S., M.B.I.M., on 'The structure and dynamics of management information'.

The earliest forms of business involved control through close contact and detailed personal information. Growth has led to geographical dispersion and indirect overall control: competition and the increasing complexities of know-how have imposed a need for specialization. The critical factors in linking decentralized operations with top management are communications and management information.

In early days the counting-house was at the hub of the firm, and accounting systems have enabled the businessman to keep a check on his operations. Development of various specializations within accountancy has provided a number of separately identifiable methods and techniques, from double entry to planned programme budgeting, many of which are connected with management information in its various aspects.

Quite apart from the accounting-based systems, contemporary literature has identified a hundred or more 'management techniques'. Check lists may be developed into a useful tool for systems analysis, as they represent a valuable condensation of practical experience. A number of management techniques which continue to be taught and applied as original or unique contributions are in fact derived from common basic roots, and long-established procedures may be resurrected as sophisticated 'operational research'. Mr Gifford gave as an example of this tendency the re-emergence of economic lot size formulae, first propounded in 1915, in the guise of 'inventory control'.

A true systems approach looks first at the system as a whole, developing an overlying framework into which compatible sub-systems can be fitted so as to contribute to the fulfilment of overall objectives. The earlier entrepreneur coped through his 'long fingers', and left little authority to subordinates. Subsequent organization design created the 'long arms' of delegation and 'short fingers' of detailed control near the scene of action, where the relevant information is available.

Management information and the computer

Mr J. B. C. Miller-Bakewell, M.A., F.C.W.A., J.DIP.M.A., quoted the cynical description of management information as 'management accounting in a blonde wig'. The cynics, however, were wrong. Much of the factual information in most businesses is held by the accounting function, but it should not be too readily assumed that accountants alone would continue to discharge this essential service to the end of time.

There are now many examples of the successful application of computers to a variety of commercial tasks involving the maintenance of extensive records, the rapid completion of many calculations, and the production of analyses and summaries of sales or expenditure data. Applications of this kind can usually be defined exhaustively and the requirement met almost exactly – at a cost. Management information, however, can never be defined exhaustively, and the computer applications will only wring the juice out of the data which has been made available to it. Much of what the manager needs can only be estimated or guessed at because it relates to the outside world – he is to a large extent the prisoner of his own assumptions. The role of the computer must therefore be to improve the quality and accuracy of his assumptions by testing them against what is already known, and by testing against each other assumptions about the growth of the markets and the strength of competition until areas of uncertainty can be reduced and the confidence with which each manager can act increased.

Other papers were also contributed by Professor J. R. Small on 'Information for financial management in business' and by Mr C. Raeburn, F.C.A., F.C.W.A., on 'Practical aspects of management information'.

Student Roundabout

EVENTS IN SHEFFIELD

OVER 40 members of the Sheffield and District Chartered Accountant Students' Society attended a residential course at Belmont Hall, Cheshire, from September 4th to 6th. The course, which was in every way a success, dealt with examination subjects for Intermediate and Part I and II students.

The Society has succeeded in joining a Sunday football league and its team won its first match by eight goals to one last Sunday week. Football is one of the Society's most popular sporting activities and joining a league is something the Society has been aiming to achieve for some time. If the first result is anything to go by it seems to 'Roundabout' that unless the other teams improve, the Society will soon be playing in the first division!

On October 2nd the Society commences its whole-day courses for Intermediate students when the subject will be 'Principles of accounting'. At subsequent courses topics will include 'Final accounts', 'Partnership accounts' and 'Published accounts and auditing'. Courses for Final Part I students start on October 16th when Mr A. K. Moir, F.C.A., will speak on 'Executorship law and accounts'. Other subjects will include 'Valuation of unquoted shares and goodwill' and 'Interpretation of accounts including movement of funds'. The courses for Part II students start on December 11th when the subjects will be 'Marginal costing' and 'Standard costing'.

BEER AND SHERRY PARTY

THE South West Essex Group of the London Chartered Accountant Students' Society commences its 1970-71 session of activities with a beer and sherry party in the Club Room, the Angel Hotel, Ilford, on October 8th at 6.15 p.m.

The Chairman of the Group, Mr D. E. Heady, F.C.A., will be present and it is hoped that as many members as possible will take the opportunity of this informal occasion to get to know one another and members of the Group's committee.

Further particulars concerning the Group's future programme may be obtained from D. J. Rosenberg, A.C.A., 92 Claremont Road, London E7. Telephone: office 01-534 3315; home 01-606 6044.

LIVERPOOL MEETINGS

THE committee of the Liverpool Chartered Accountants Students' Association are to be congratulated in presenting for members an interesting programme of lecture meetings, courses and social events for the winter months. The varied fare includes talks on The Transport and General Workers Union, duties of the Official Receiver and a visit to Speke Airport, to mention only three items on the programme. In addition, Liverpool will be the hosts for the National Business Game which is to be held at Liverpool University on December 18th and 19th.

On October 1st there is to be a talk on 'The future of traffic and transportation on Merseyside', by a speaker from the City Engineer's Office, and a week later, on October 8th, Mr J. Lawson will be giving a talk on 'The structure of the Inland Revenue'. The visit to Speke Airport has been arranged for November 5th - with ample time allowed for members to be back in time for Guy Fawkes parties!

Mr John V. R. Anderson, M.A., A.C.A., will again be giving his two-day course of lectures for Intermediate and Final students in the New Year, and in January it is proposed to hold a long week-end course - Thursday to Sunday inclusive - at Caer Rhun Hall for approximately 90 members.

The principal social functions will be a barbecue and treasure hunt in conjunction with the Chester and North Wales Branch later this month, an informal dance on December 8th and the annual dinner dance on January 25th. At sport, the usual rugby, soccer, squash and badminton fixtures are being arranged under the guidance of Duncan Boxwell.

LONDON SPARKLE AT CRICKET

IN a cricket match against Cardiff CASS on August 20th, on a very wet pitch, with rain clouds threatening all the time, the CASS of London completed their fifth cricket win in successive matches - their other successes being against Birmingham CASS, Cardiff CASS, the Chartered Insurance Institute students, and Bournemouth CASS.

Cardiff won the toss and although they lost two early wickets, Brian Parfitt and Iqbal Asim applied themselves to restoring the position. It was slow going, but by the time they were both out the score was a promising 87 for 4. However, a devastating second spell by Ian Kirwan, in which he took five for six in 6.2 overs, shattered the innings. Tony Sanderson also picked up two wickets, and the final score was 114.

With rain clouds threatening to bring about an early close, the CASSL batsmen made sure of victory by scoring 115 runs in 90 minutes. Both Steve Collier and Len Kite set about the bowling in aggressive style, and both had their share of luck; each player hit five fours. Although Keith Edwards took 3 for 8 in three overs, the result was never really in doubt, the winning run coming with nearly an hour to spare!

HUDDERSFIELD DANCE

'RECKONCILIATION', is the title which The Chartered Accountant Students' Society of Huddersfield have given to a dance which they are holding at Brighouse Civic Hall on Friday, October 2nd, from 8 p.m. until 1 a.m. Dancing will be to the 'Welcome' Group from London and to the DRM discothèque. It is expected that over 400 members and guests will attend.

Tickets, price 8s each, may be obtained from A. M. Kidd, c/o Simpson Wood & Co, Bank Chambers, Market Street, Huddersfield

THE INSTITUTE OF COST AND WORKS ACCOUNTANTS

London Conference

'Action for profit making' is the title of a one-day conference to be held by the London Branch of The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants on November 6th, at the Hotel Russell, London WC1.

The conference will examine the problem of identifying common interests at every level in a business, and more interest in a person's work through greater participation. This means a change of attitude at the highest levels resulting in greater delegation. A common aim for success throughout management calls for the setting of objectives, the realization that change is inevitable and that profits are essential for progress as well as for higher salaries and wages.

Sir Max Bemrose, chairman of Universal Printers Ltd, of Derby, and Mr Douglas Manser, F.C.A., F.C.W.A., J.DIP.M.A., senior executive, Thomas Tilling Ltd, are two of the speakers who will contribute from their special knowledge and experience of the problems of improving communications.

The conference fee is £5 10s inclusive of refreshments and luncheon. Applications to attend should be addressed to the Conference Registrar, Mr K. L. Lucas, A.C.W.A., 78 Vigilant Way, Gravesend, Kent.

SCOTTISH INSTITUTE'S POST-QUALIFYING COURSES

'Management development, training and communications', 'Current taxation', and 'Flowcharting and analytical auditing' are the titles of three courses to be held in October in the post-qualifying education programme of The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland.

The first course, which is a residential one, is being held from October 22nd to 23rd at the Great Western Royal Hotel, London, and will deal with such matters as management training, personnel audit and management selection. Also residential, the second course will take place at the Station Hotel, Perth, from October 28th to 29th. Its object will be to consider the implications and inter-relationship of some current tax legislation beyond basic principles and to lay emphasis on the application of these taxes in problems commonly confronting accountants.

The third course, to be held on October 30th, also at the Great Western Hotel, will examine the approach to the transactions audit and its advantages over existing methods. Practical work will be provided on both flow-charting and weakness analysis.

The courses are also open to members of kindred accountancy bodies as well as non-accountants. Further particulars may be obtained from the Director of Post-qualifying Education at the Institute's offices, 27 Queen Street, Edinburgh EH2 1LA.

MAYFAIR TAX DISCUSSION GROUP

The first meeting of the Mayfair Tax Discussion Group since its merger with the Piccadilly Tax Discussion Group took place at Devonshire Street House, London W1, on Wednesday of last week.

No arrangements had been made for a guest speaker as the prime object of the meeting was for members to have an opportunity to get acquainted with each other. There was, however, time for a short general discussion on some practical points relating to the 1970 Finance Act.

The next meeting of the group will be at the same venue on October 13th commencing at 6 p.m. Further particulars regarding the group may be obtained from the secretary, Mr Alan Gilbey, F.C.A., c/o Shears & Gilbey, 55 Queen Anne Street, London W1.

THE CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS' BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION

At a recent meeting of the Management Committee, with Mr R. L. Eke, F.C.A., President of the Association, in the chair, and eight members present, consideration was given to five new applications. Assistance was given to four applicants, one of whom was the widow of a member who died as the result of enemy action in the Second World War; she was also given a nomination for a place in a home of Crossways Trust. One application was refused.

Increase in benefits

Forty-one applications for the renewal of grants were considered and further grants, many at increased rates, were made in all cases. Changes in circumstances were reported in the case of twelve beneficiaries and appropriate action was taken.

It was decided that, in view of the further increase in the cost of living the scale of benefits which was increased a year ago, should be further increased.

Christmas 1970

It was decided to make the usual distribution of Christmas food parcels to most beneficiaries and to make cash donations in other cases.

Homes for old people

Two additional nomination rights for places in the homes of Crossways Trust for those who are infirm are to be purchased by the Association.

The Computer. Efficient tool or expensive toy?

Unfunnily enough, it can be either.

In the right hands, a computer is an efficient management tool.

In the wrong hands, the same computer is an expensive luxury nobody can afford.

Costing more than the savings it makes.

That is why, at NCR, we would never sell you a machine, and leave it at that.

We specialise in solving business problems, not creating them.

We would first solve your problems.

Then advise you on the best computer to carry through those solutions.

And go on to train your staff to program and operate the computer.

So that when we leave you, not only will you have the most advanced computer at its price, the NCR Century. But also a total business system that can go beyond payrolls and invoicing to give you the invaluable management information you need.

And put you in complete command of your business, perhaps for the first time.

Toys are fun.

But then, you're not in business for fun, are you?

A Fundamental Problem

THE New Look, as we remember it in 1947, came as an immediate sequel to a particularly trying period of human affairs. It was applied to a subject which many found both fascinating and of continuing importance, and whose existing standards had been evolved on a basis of empiricism and, often enough, stark necessity. The same expression has been widely applied to this year's Cambridge summer course of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, and we trust that the analogy drawn in this paragraph will not be found inappropriate.

We have previously remarked on the volume of criticism – not all of it objective or well-informed – that has been levelled at the profession in recent years. Accountants are not, of course, the only sufferers and the traditional mystique of several of the consultant professions has sustained a certain amount of rough handling in a world which seems to be peopled increasingly by those more conscious of their rights than of their responsibilities.

Egalitarianism and legal aid have sponsored a certain tendency, not to say eagerness, to 'have the law on somebody', anybody, in respect of any untoward event and if this happens to be a spectacular commercial collapse, the auditor or his professional indemnity insurers are likely to be the only speculative targets worth powder and shot.

The accumulated learning of the traditional professions is immense, the value of their work in elevating standards of practice is incalculable. Yet in no instance that one can think of does any profession claim to practise an exact science. Doctors may differ over the line of treatment most likely to alleviate some obscure disease; lawyers debate a nice point of law in a judgment which has been 'distinguished' by a bare majority of the House of Lords; architects learn at appalling cost the effects of wind pressure or explosion in specific cases; accountants fail to agree on the monetary evaluation of slow-moving goods or the effects of inter-company trading. The public, expecting to find certainty in areas where there can be none, raises shocked hands to high heaven and clamours for blood.

There is, to be sure, much in the traditional presentation of a set of accounts to inspire a comfortable feeling of precision; the fact of everything being neatly slotted into place and added up with nothing left over accords well with the traditional image of the accountant, cynically, as the narrow-minded guardian of the petty cash or, romantically and no more accurately, as the hawk-eyed and infallible detector of fraud. Two and two will always make four, but if each component of the equation includes an element of opinion, then the final total is likely to be less predictable.

Last week's gathering at Cambridge, as will be seen from the report on other pages of this issue, afforded an opportunity for the profession not only to look again at 'What is profit?' but also to learn more of the approach to accounts of other interested parties and to consider the position of accounting principles and standards as either mandatory or persuasive authority.

The importance of this cannot be overstated. In the United States, the profession has already suffered the embarrassment of a Court ruling that the fairness of a presentation must be tested by what an investor or other layman might want to know, rather than by reference to 'generally accepted accounting principles': there is, in other words, a distinction between the observance of such principles and achieving their presumed objective.

In Britain, accountants have been known to deride the legal profession for its inability to understand accounts but their laughter, like Jack Point's, may have an echo that is grim. Information is not the same thing as a means of information, and accounts that defeat one of Her Majesty's judges are unlikely to afford much enlightenment on top of the Clapham omnibus.

Year of Stagnation

FOR the statistically-minded and enthusiasts for macro-economics the annual Blue Book on the National Income and Expenditure 1970 (HMSO 12s) provides the customary fare of statistics relating to the national economy. Like all its recent predecessors it reviews the economy over the period 1959-1969 in considerable detail and, despite the caveat in the introduction relating to the reliability of the figures in the numerous tables, there is no means of assessing the validity of individual estimates or series. To make this point is not to criticize the statisticians responsible; the annual Blue Book has become a remarkable statistical tour de force. Not everyone, however, who may turn to it for information is aware of the problems involved in compiling series such as those relating to changes in book values of stocks and work in progress, or the input-output tables which are so useful for viewing the economy as an interdependent whole.

In the same way, the section of the Blue Book which covers definitions of the items in the various tables is hardly in either the most readable or imaginative form. The impression remains that while it is inevitable that specialist contributors are employed for each sector of the statistical data, there is an obvious absence of any overriding editorial control.

A good case can be made out for separating notes from the tables to which they relate; but unless it is assumed that only economic-statisticians or econometricians are likely to study the Blue Book data, there is a strong argument for a brief exposition, coupled with caveats relating to reliability, to accompany or precede each table. As any good cook knows, the appearance of the dish is as important as its contents. And when it comes to cooking, statisticians have an unfortunate reputation among some members of the public!

Such reservations apart, however, there is much of interest for students of the UK economy. The year 1969 was disappointing in a number of respects. The gross domestic product rose by 5 per cent between 1968 and 1969 in money terms, but in real terms the increase was less than 2 per cent. This was substantially less than the average annual increase of 3 per cent recorded between 1959 and 1969. Total domestic expenditure was also up on the previous year, but rising prices were the dominating feature of that increase. Accordingly, in volume terms, personal consumption rose by less than half of 1 per cent, while public authorities' consumption fell by 1 per cent, and fixed investment by over $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

The one bright spot in 1969 came from the increase in demand from overseas, with the value of exports of goods and services increasing by over £1,000 million in the year, representing a 12 per cent increase. Since imports and property income paid abroad rose by only $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, there was a very substantial improvement in the current account of the balance of payments.

An interesting feature of the tabulations is the comparison of the relative contribution made to total domestic income in 1959 and 1969 by the main industrial groupings. Thus, the combined contribution of agriculture, forestry and fishing fell from 4.2 to 3 per cent; and that of mining and quarrying from 3.3 to 1.7 per cent. Manufacturing, too, showed a slight decline from 35.7 to 34 per cent, but these falls were offset by increases in the share of public services, which rose from 9.9 to 11.1 per cent, and other services, mainly financial and owner-occupation, from 18.1 to 21.2 per cent.

The nationalized sector represented by the gas, electricity and water undertakings increased its contribution from 2.7 to 3.5 per cent, but the distributive trades eased from 12.2 to 10.7 per cent over the same period.

Taxes on income absorbed a higher proportion of personal income in 1969 and the increase in personal disposable income compared with 1968 was under 6 per cent. When allowance is made for increases in consumer prices the growth in 'real' personal disposable income was only $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent compared with an annual average of over $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent between 1959 and 1969.

A breakdown of consumer expenditure in 1959 and 1969 shows some interesting changes. The share of expenditure absorbed by food fell from 25.8 to 20.9 per cent; the contribution of household and durable goods dropped from 5.3 to 4.1 per cent and that from clothing and footwear also declined by 1.1 points to 8.4 per cent. Among the items to increase were housing, from 9.7 to 12.5 per cent, and motoring (including motor-cycles) from 5.7 to 8 per cent. The last constitutes the largest single percentage change in any major category of personal expenditure over the 11-year period.

Between 1968 and 1969 consumer prices rose by over 5 per cent, which was well above the average of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent a year recorded between 1959 and 1969. Over that same period the purchasing power of the £ fell to 14s 5d last year. These figures are probably the most chastening of all and it is little consolation to be told that inflation is a world-wide affliction.

Cost Accountants' Examinations

THE Institute of Cost and Works Accountants celebrated its golden jubilee last year and continues to grow in strength. Membership of the Institute as at January 1st this year was 10,831, to which the 552 potential members who successfully completed Part V of their examinations in June will provide a welcome accretion.

The total entry for all parts of the examination on this occasion was 11,384, of whom 4,407 were successful. This indicates an overall pass rate of approximately 38.7 per cent, although this statistic varied considerably as between the different parts.

Mr J. B. Challenor, of Birmingham, was awarded the S. Lawrence Gill prize for the first place in Part V. Other awards went to Mr C. W. Brownlee, of Blackrock (the Lewton Coronation prize for Advanced Accountancy and Financial Management); Mr R. A. H.

Aitken, of Hitchin (the Harold Wilmot prize for Management Principles and Practice); and Mr C. G. Steele, of Bellshill (the Leverhulme prize for first place in Part IV).

A full list of the successful candidates in Part V and a summary of the overall results appear on other pages of this issue.

City Code Tightened on Share Accumulations

RULE 30 of the City Code bans dealings of any kind in the relative shares by any person who is privy to preliminary take-over or merger discussions or to an intention to make an offer. In their last annual report the City Panel recorded a ruling that 'any person' includes a company and the proposed offeror.

The City Working Party and the Panel have always accepted that there may be good commercial or investment considerations for the accumulation of shares in a possible offeree company. The directors and shareholders of possible offeree companies are given some protection by the Companies Act 1967, which requires the public disclosure of direct and indirect holdings exceeding 10 per cent of the voting capital. In a statement issued last week-end the Panel state that in interpreting Rule 30, they expect potential offerors to comply with the spirit of the rule in considering when 'an intention to make an offer' is formed, and the Panel Executive certainly would not look only at formal evidence, such as minutes of board meetings, but rather at the formation of the intention in the minds of those playing a leading part in the offeror company's affairs.

There have been instances recently where a number of apparently independent parties within a short period accumulated blocks of shares in a potential offeree company in circumstances where no individual holding was large enough to call for disclosure under the Companies Act 1967, but where the total holdings acquired by these parties who were, in fact, acting 'in concert' represented a critical factor in the mounting of the offer. This practice is sometimes referred to as 'warehousing'.

The Panel therefore invited the City Working Party to consider whether small amendments should be made to the code with a view to ensuring that the purchases of such critical holdings by persons acting 'in concert', and effected within six months before the date of the offer, require to be disclosed and thus come under the scrutiny of the Panel and of public opinion.

The City Working Party has agreed that the disclosure of such holdings acquired by persons acting in concert would be consistent with the code and, accordingly, Rules 8 and 16 have been amended by the insertion of the italicized wording below:

Rule 8

'When an offer is announced, the identity of the offeror company must be disclosed and that company must disclose any existing holding in the offeree company which it owns or over which it has control or which is owned or controlled by any person or company acting in concert with the offeror company in relation to the offer.'

Rule 16

'The offer document must state the shareholdings of the offeror company in the offeree company together with the total of the shareholdings in the offeree company in which directors of the offeror company are interested and the shareholdings in the offeree company which any person or company acting in concert with the offeror company in relation to the offer owns or controls (with names of such persons acting in concert).'

The remainder of Rule 16 is unchanged and the last two sentences which require detailed disclosure of shares purchased within six months of the date of the offer document is to apply equally to shares purchased within that period by persons acting in concert with the offeror company.

Future of Accountancy Education

THE full implications of the failure of the integration scheme are yet to be realized. One of the several bodies to express its concern is the Association of Lecturers in Accountancy (ALIA), which represents some 300 accountancy teachers in colleges of further education throughout the country.

In a statement recently issued through its chairman, Mr E. C. D. Evans, B.Sc.(ECON.), F.A.C.C.A., A.C.I.S., A.M.B.I.M., ALIA points out that the provision of educational facilities is governed by the number of students and by the nature and duration of courses. As in most other spheres, future requirements have to be planned ahead and expenditure budgeted, thus other bodies and disciplines with a clearer view of their future may be able to present a better case for the use of relatively scarce educational resources.

The recognized bodies of accountants are urged to implement as quickly as they can a clearly defined policy of education and training, based as far as possible on the proposals in the integration scheme. ALIA is also 'fully persuaded that the recently formed Advisory Board for Accountancy Education should become an effective joint vehicle for the future development and discussion of educational matters between all the professional bodies'.

It would be a setback for the profession if the absence of positive education plans for the future should result in accountancy educational facilities not being fully developed.

A Sorry Story

THERE can be very few people indeed in the UK who have not become increasingly aware, during recent months, of the persistent and worrying rate of inflation. The continuous rise in prices is hardly a new phenomenon; we have been living with it for the past 30 years. What makes the latest phase so depressing is not so much the fact that prices seem to be rising faster than ever, but rather that the Government is being forced to recognize that to an increasing extent the public is aware that it needs to adjust its spending and saving habits to the new situation.

A new report from the National Economic Development Office entitled Productivity, Prices and Incomes: A General Review 1969 adds little to what has already been said on these issues many times over before, during and after the last election. It reminds the reader of the White Paper which stated that most wage and salary settlements after 1969 needed to fall in the range of 2½-4½ per cent if the aim of greater price stability was to be achieved; and it gives a statistical analysis which shows just how far from that desideratum the Government's policy fell short.

While between 1968 and 1969 the gross domestic product rose by 2 per cent, the general price level rose by 4·7 per cent and retail prices by 5·4 per cent. While corporate gross trading profits fell by 3·8 per cent, weekly wage rates rose by 5·2 per cent, leading to a rise of 7·8 per cent in weekly earnings. Average salary earnings fully matched wages with a rise over the twelve months to October 1969 of 7·7 per cent, with much of the increase coming in the latter part of the period.

As the report sombrely notes 'in 1969, unlike 1968, increased earnings were not associated with big increases in output and productivity'. While corporate profits, as mentioned, fell in 1969, corporate income was about 5 per cent higher due largely to the continuing high rate of increase in non-trading income, which reflected higher interest rates and a further sharp increase in income from abroad.

IMF on Exchange Rates

IN a new report entitled The Role of Exchange Rates in the Adjustment of International Payments, the executive directors of the International Monetary Fund provide strong support for the views expressed in our leading article last week that floating or managed rates for sterling were no answer to the UK's economic difficulties. As we then noted, the executive directors stress that 'judgement on the advisability of instituting any change in existing arrangements or in their implementation involves a weighing of the balance between potential benefits and potential costs'. More to the point, the IMF directors add that 'technical or organizational arrangements can never serve as substitutes for correct policy decisions'.

The report falls into two parts. The first and longer section examines the technical and economic considerations for and against various methods of regulating exchange rates, while the second sums up the policy implications of the various alternatives. There is strong support for the need to maintain stability of exchange rates which, in the opinion of the IMF directors, 'is a key contribution to the balanced expansion of international trade' and points out to those who would prefer to see the UK adopt an

Under Fire

by an Industrious Accountant

THE senior of the audit team now with us on an interim visit joined me for a couple of beers in the Red Lion adjoining the store, our object being an informal chat on his unofficial opinion of our new financial accountant's progress and prowess. Scotty, ensconced at the bar, hailed us as we entered.

How come two firms of your shattered accountants can disagree so violently about the results of the same figures?, he asked with a smirk. 'Why dinna ye get an umpire to straighten oot the laddies?' His assistant, Bertie, a glib young pup whose ear I'd like to clip some day, said another accountant umpire would probably give a third set of equally wrong figures. Those dashed book-keepers hadn't a clue about stocktaking, he sneered; they wouldn't unsnarl the knot in a month of Sundays, heaven help the suffering public!

The groups around us did a spot of guffawing, so Scotty declared he'd tak' doon the auld family claymore to cut the tangled knot, like that Greek laddie. Maybe though the puir shareholders would prefer a head or two lopped off, instead of wasting their guid saxpences on all those blathering caterwauls about misinterpretation.

I nudged the auditor to counter-attack, but he flushed pinkly and said it was all very complicated. Tax, you know, and family companies and unascertained liabilities; investigations were proceeding.

Bertie said 'too proud to fight, eh?' Trevor, who never read the financial section of his morning paper until he was promoted last year, asked how accountancy could be trusted if it wasn't an exact science, like that chairman chap said. The alternatives of half a million against two million was just a bit much! Some wisecracks about replacing auditors with computers followed. My companion's defensive effort, to the effect that stock values were the directors' responsibility rather than the auditors', came lamely, too little, too late. Tell that to the widows and orphans, they hooted at him.

I butted in with some historical facts about the subjective element in all obsolete stock valuations and the blunders made in good faith which were so obvious with the help of hindsight . . . we'd dropped a clanger or two in our own boardroom over the years. The audience accepted the basic principle but Scotty warmed by his third Black and White, pressed the attack.

Directors had been optimistic before, he pontificated, or gullible or orientated to excessive window-dressing as an integral part of the industrial battle. That was the nature of the beast. But it was another matter to take the profit before the goods were sold, let alone writing-up the value of 'sale or return' merchandise and under-depreciating obsolete stocks. Why, even a bairn would have more sense.

A bored-looking character, drinking brandy, said it wasn't the first time the profession had come under fire, if one cared to recall that AEI altercation; and a sherry-sipping type said the Government should establish an investigatory tribunal. Must exercise judicially impartial acumen, he asserted; can't let this nonsense continue. My companion repeated that the matter involved problems of protocol and personalities, and besides it was sub judice, in a manner of speaking, but they shouted him down.

I claimed loudly that an Institute top-level pronouncement in full clarification was imminent, and my brisk but groundless confidence silenced the scoffers momentarily, but I felt that the whole episode was lamentable as an instance of adverse publicity for the profession. We departed with a dejected suspicion that our neighbours felt accountants were demonstrating inability to cope with their difficulties.

independent policy that 'the determination of the rate of exchange for each currency is a matter of international concern'.

In short, the present par value system provides 'a framework for the maintenance of stability and order in exchange rates which is an essential condition for the expansion and balanced growth of international trade'. The report reiterates the advice given in the annual report of the IMF, quoted last week, to the effect that members of the IMF should pursue internal policies that will keep the growth in aggregate demand in line with the development of available resources. The UK is not alone in failing to fulfil that particular condition!

Never on a Sunday?

by IAN S. BLACKSHAW

At law, a company – or, more technically, a corporation – is a distinct legal person with distinct legal rights, obligations and powers. However, by its very nature, there are definite limits, both legal and practical.

UNDER the criminal law the general rule is that a corporation is liable to the same extent as a natural person. Exceptions necessarily occur in the case of certain offences – bigamy, for instance – which a corporation cannot possibly commit and in the case of certain other offences – murder, for instance – where the prescribed penalty is corporal.

The true nature, for legal purposes, of a company was recently the subject of a preliminary issue in the case of Rolloswin Investments Ltd v. Chromolit Portugal Cutelarias E Produtos Metalicos SARL ([1970] 114 SJ 354) (in this article referred to as 'the Rolloswin case'). What were the facts?

Facts of the Rolloswin case

Two limited liability companies concluded a contract for the sale of certain goods on a Sunday. Subsequently, a dispute arose between the contracting parties. Litigation ensued. The defendant company claimed (inter alia) that, if there was a binding contract, it was unenforceable under the provisions of section 1 of the Sunday Observance Act 1677. This section provides that no tradesman, artificer, workman, labourer, or other person whatsoever (my italics), shall do or exercise any worldly labour, business or work of his ordinary calling on Sunday, works of necessity or charity being excepted. Certainly an ingenious defence!

By section 2 (1) of the Interpretation Act 1889 in the construction of every enactment relating to an offence punishable on indictment or on summary conviction, whether contained in an Act passed before or after the commencement (January 1st, 1890) of the Act, the expression 'person' shall, unless the contrary intention appears, include a body corporate. Was there such an intention in the Rolloswin case?

Decision in the Rolloswin case

Mr Justice Mocatta held that, from the wording of the 1677 Act, there was such an intention and that the contract was therefore enforceable. His reasons will now be summarized.

He pertinently observed that the present-day social background in relation to Sunday observance was very different from what it was in 1677 and that the statute also provided that all persons should 'apply themselves . . . in the duties of piety and true religion . . . upon the Lord's day . . .'. A limited company, of course, was quite incapable of public worship or of exercising itself in the duties of piety and true religion. Further, a limited company did not, in fact, exist in 1677 and section 2 (1) of the Interpretation Act 1889 could not in the circumstances apply. An appropriate order was made.

Conclusions

Although the decision in the Rolloswin case is quite clearly correct in principle, a distinction nevertheless arises between trading activities by unincorporate associations (for example, partnerships) and incorporated associations, because of a rather obsolete seventeenth-century enactment. It is well known that nowadays a great deal of business is transacted on a Sunday. The net result would thus appear to be somewhat inequitable and it is submitted that the law should be rationalized and brought up to date by repealing section 1 of the Sunday Observance Act 1677. Perhaps the Law Commission could take the initiative?

What is Profit?

A New Look at an Old Question

THE modern architecture of Churchill College, Cambridge, formed an appropriate setting for this year's 'new look' Summer Course of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales. Applications for this course had been particularly heavy, and over 200 members assembled last Wednesday under the chairmanship of Mr D. S. Morpeth, T.D., B.COM., F.C.A., Vice-President of the Institute.

Theme of the course

Mr Morpeth's introductory remarks established the theme of the course. He spoke of the considerably increased interest now being shown in published accounts by all kinds of people. Shareholders were concerned primarily with the dividend yield of their investment, and did not trouble about the management unless results were catastrophic. The Inland Revenue had a different approach, and examined the accounts in considerably greater detail. There had been an impression that accounts once audited were 'absolutely correct', but unfortunately this cosy situation was due to end.

In the Duple Motor Bodies case, a loss could be made into a profit according to whether overheads were excluded or included in the valuation of stock and work in progress. Told that either course was in accordance with accepted accounting principles, the [then] Master of the Rolls is reported to have said: 'That absolutely defeats me.' Mr Morpeth also mentioned the City of London Real Property Company, Rolls Razor, AEI and Pergamon Press cases as instances of how the assessment of 'profit' might vary under different managements and with the lapse of time.

'We must now look anew at the state of our art' declared Mr Morpeth. 'We cannot afford complacency, and we are all custodians of the name "chartered accountant". If we do not satisfy the needs of today, someone else - possibly the government, or the business schools - may step into the void.' Reminding his hearers of the Accounting Standards Steering Committee's terms of reference, he stated that definitive standards once established must be enforced, and added: 'We shall have to take investigatory and disciplinary powers in this area.'

Mr Morpeth attributed to an American speaker at last week's Edinburgh conference of the British Accounting and Finance Association the opinion that the [American] Accounting Principles Board should take a look at fundamental principles instead of wasting time in 'putting out bush fires'. In this country, work was now in hand on 90 per cent of the ASSC programme, but this would require a great deal of work and resources and some projects might take five years to complete.

The professional investor

The first speaker on Thursday was Mr R. S. Allen, who originally read for the Bar and graduated thence to the Stock Exchange via the investment department of an insurance company. He is now a partner in Messrs J. & A. Scrimgeour, in charge of their research department, and is a member both of the council of the Society of Investment Analysts and of the committee set up by that society to comment on the work of the Accounting Standards Steering Committee.

The scope of investment analysis may be expected to grow considerably, and analysts are now tending to specialise by industry (in Mr Allen's own case, the United Kingdom manufacturing and distributive trades) and to make their studies in depth. The analyst's position outside the company made it difficult for him to assess such matters as the depth of its management, but from that same position he can put each set of accounts into a large context. Unlike the fixed-interest stockholder, whose position barring catastrophe is secure, the prospective equity shareholder is buying a share, not of the past, but of the future. The purpose of analysis is to reduce the areas of uncertainty; or, as Mr Allen expressed it: 'you get a series of accuracies, and on to that you put an informed guess'.

He also emphasized the importance of 'earnings per share' as a standard of performance. Growth in profit terms alone does not always come through as earnings per share, and one answer to 'what is profit?' might be 'The raw material from which is refined earnings per share. Some refineries are a great deal better than others'.

A consumer's viewpoint

'As a consumer', said Mr Allen, 'I know what the thing looks like. How it's arrived at, I'm not quite clear'. He disclaimed any intention of speaking at length on the accounting treatment of specific items, but offered a few comments:

Stock and work in progress. 'This is the most fertile source of company failures.' Companies which are subject to fluctuations in their raw material are in a vulnerable position, as most analysts prefer to see a rising or a steady pattern of earnings rather than one which fluctuates.

Depreciation. The treatment of this item 'does actually give an idea what the management's attitude of mind is'. Some companies are manifestly more perceptive than others of the perils of being 'locked in' with old equipment.

Taxation. There is, in Mr Allen's view, no reason why the explanation of any variations from normal levels in the charge for taxation should not be given to shareholders.

'If a company includes capital profit, it has a reason for doing so, and we draw our own conclusions. Any decent analyst takes it out again. . . . Some companies have a genius for non-recurring expenditure recurring. They just look accident-prone.' The first step in examination of any set of published accounts is to see whether the auditors have introduced a qualification, and if so 'there should be some method by which that qualification is much more spotlighted than at present'.

Mr Allen was enthusiastically in favour of the disclosure of turnover figures, and their distribution on a geographical basis and between products and customers. 'It really does open up a quite different vista of the company to the outsider. It does enlighten the picture enormously. We really are very grateful for turnover figures.'

'When you start to estimate the future, you are likely to start at turnover level. It's nice to know what that turnover consists of.' This enables the analyst to make an informed guess at the risk factor, as for instance in the case of single-product company, 92 per cent of whose output went to a single customer. Unfortunately the 1967 disclosure requirements were not always observed in the spirit, a particular example of this being the Ranks-Hovis-McDougall group which gave 'food' as the single source of its total turnover.

It may be expected in the future that companies will grow in size, in power and in their international activities, and that the big institutional investors which have hitherto refrained from asserting themselves will become bigger, more powerful and more demanding. They are now flexing their muscles. In these circumstances, if it is inevitable to be squeezed into disclosing more, it is better to do it gracefully.

The role of the financial journalist

Mr Patrick Hutber, city editor of The Sunday Telegraph and a former 'Lex' of The Financial Times, began with a list of his personal rules for investment. These included:

- 'There is no substitute for inside information.'
- 'By the time it reaches the City, it is too late.'
- 'One accountant on the board is a necessity, but five accountants is cause for concern.'

The role of the financial journalist includes news-gathering, entertainment and economic and political comment. His most relevant function in the present context is 'to equip the man in the street to deal with financial affairs'.

'I am like the man in the National Gallery, trying to get through the layers of varnish over centuries or decades to see the colours that the painter painted. . . . If, as we are told, truth lies at the bottom of a well, then I am the patient donkey plodding round and round the well, hoping that the truth will eventually gush out.'

In his use of accounts, the financial journalist has a reporting function, an interpretative function, a prophetic function and at times a watchdog function. 'There are great limitations in this process, not least the law of libel in this country. We can occasionally bang the drum and alert public opinion. I personally have never yet provoked a Board of Trade inquiry, although I have had a good try.'

Amongst his problems, Mr Hutber included an inadequacy of information in several respects. He would like to see a meaningful geographic split of assets, more detail of the wages bill and a figure for value added in the course of manufacture. He also criticized the sophisticated presentation of a 'clean' profit and loss account of perhaps half a dozen items with all the detail in the notes; this form he described as a 'do-it-yourself' kit. 'I don't want a clean profit and loss account,' he said, 'I want a dirty one.'

Mr Hutber then passed to a selection of 'the most unforgettable accounts I've ever read', chosen on the basis that the problem in each case was not the most obvious one. The first was Rolls Razor, whose 1963 accounts were published in May 1964 and showed a profit after tax in the region of £400,000. Three months later, in August, an approximate deficiency of £4 million was revealed by a preliminary statement of affairs.

The next name in the list of 'unforgettable accounts' was Pergamon, in which the difference of professional opinion between two firms of accountants had made it possible for Mr Robert Maxwell to say that any attempt at explanation by himself would merely add to the confusion. Every scandal of this nature raises new issues, and leads to the stopping of loopholes.

These examples were followed with a list of admittedly awkward questions. What is accounting about? What does the auditor's report mean? Should you trust the directors? What about depreciation, about stocks, about inflation? What is the future of the capitalist system? Are all our assumptions valid? We are dealing rather badly with inflation at the moment, but it does not necessarily follow that this will always be the case.

'Like Socrates in his wisdom', declared Mr Hutber, 'I have asked a number of questions without providing the answers, and I am painfully aware of what happened to him as a result.' He concluded by stressing the importance of having faith in the system and in the integrity of people if anxieties are to be laid to rest.

The 'take-over merchant'

Mr J. D. Slater, F.C.A., chairman of Slater Walker Securities Ltd, which holds interests in some 50 public companies in the United Kingdom and abroad, was introduced as a 'takeover merchant', although preferring to describe himself as an acquirer. He suggested one or two additions to Mr Hutber's list of rules for investment:

- 'Always be suspicious of delay in publishing accounts. It takes longer to prepare bad accounts than good ones'.
- 'Evaluate the board on a "points" basis, scoring one for executives, two for colonels and three for admirals. If the total reaches 15, sell.'

The basic reason for company acquisitions is to increase earnings per share, with asset backing, or exceptionally to protect the profitability of an important subsidiary.

In a takeover situation, beauty is often in the eye of the beholder, and accountants may need to improve their character reading of individuals. The same person's impressions of the same company may be materially influenced by his own position as a vendor or as a buyer! Much of the information used by an acquirer can be deduced from the target company's published accounts, as for instance:

- Ratios.*
- Net profit to capital employed.
- Net profit to sales.
- Debtors and creditors to sales.
- Stock to sales.
- Investment income to investments.
- Net profit to number of employees.
- Number of employees to sales.

Liquidity. The estimated cash flow is important. Under present conditions of restricted credit, an adverse cash flow could lead a company into financial difficulties, or result in borrowing at penal rates of interest.

Details of assets. 'The balance sheet of a target company is studied, with its notes, in detail in order to form an idea of assets per share at book values – and, more important, at realizable values.'

Taxation. Earnings per share are calculated after providing for corporation tax at 45 per cent. Any divergence between this and the figure in the accounts is investigated.

Capital structure. This is studied very closely, with particular reference to, e.g., loan stock falling due for repayment or with conversion rights.

Other information. Any note in the accounts about properties being worth more or less than their book value is of particular interest. The chairman's statement may give an impression of the quality of management, or may yield information over a period of the performance of an individual section of the company.

Additional information

The acquirer needs to know 'what makes the business tick, bit by bit'. His four fundamentals are its earnings, assets, liquidity and gearing. He is interested in how its assets are split up, which assets are earning profits and at what rate.

A good idea of a target company's strengths and weaknesses can be built up from several sources. These include surveys of the industry in question, trade inquiries, the target company's own brochures, sales literature and house magazine, credit ratings and a press-cuttings file. Information on the files at Companies House includes the registers of members, directors' shareholdings and charges on the company's assets, and details of subsidiary and associated companies. If secured loan stock is outstanding, a copy of the trust deed (which may contain material restrictions on future borrowing) should be obtained if possible.

The fragility of maintainable profit

'Many acquirers purchase a business to add to another in the same line. It is important in that event for the acquirer's operating management to have prepared detailed case studies of the way in which the two companies' facilities would be rationalized.' It is advisable to look at the 'quality' of profit; interest and dividends receivable being, for instance, more predictable and calling for less direct action to maintain them than are manufacturing and contracting activities. Similar arguments apply where the loss of any one customer may be a material factor. Loss-making activities 'can usually be terminated if they are treated realistically', and this may have a 'dramatic' effect upon profitability.

'Just as the quality of profit is vital, so is the quality of assets, and the two concepts are interrelated.' The importance of asset backing lies also in their realizable value, and it is very necessary to have a clear idea of net realizable values as a 'bedrock' figure to compare with the capitalization of the profit forecast.

Questioned on the extent of the 'takeover merchant's' contribution to the common good, Mr Slater instanced his value as a reminder to directors of their duty to employ shareholders' funds profitably; the beneficial effect on the use of assets; the economic advantages of rationalization, and a closer attention to exports. He concluded: 'In the last analysis, judgment is the vital factor, and I doubt if this will ever be quite as evenly distributed as the chairman's statement and the report and accounts.'

Ascertainment of profit

Mr H. Norris, F.C.A., financial director of George Wimpey & Co Ltd, spoke of 'The ascertainment of profit'. He offered two texts, or possibly anti-texts, as a basis for discussion but not necessarily approval, the first being drawn from Professor J. B. Canning's book The Economics of Accountancy, and the second from Accounting Concepts of Profit, by Stephen Gilman.

'The accountants have no complete philosophical system of thought about income: nor is there any evidence that they have ever greatly felt the need for one. Their generalizations about income, to the extent that they go beyond procedure at all, are too inchoate, in comparison with the structure of procedure they have built up, to permit one to suppose that they have ever seriously put their minds to the philosophical task. They have built up their structure of theory only to the extent that they found suitable and convenient statistical material to clothe it in.'

'The significance of periodic accounting profit is, therefore, the algebraic sum of the separate significances of the various conventions, doctrines, rules and practices which at any particular time constitute the common law of accounting.'

Objective scientific measurement

The measurement of profit may be considered in comparison with the objective scientific measurement of other things, as distance. Like the distance from the earth to the moon, profit is a real thing, even if there is a problem in measuring it. The main purpose of accounts is for the information of the proprietors of a business; and in the case of a retail fishmonger who has, let us hope, no slow-moving stock and whose turnover is mainly for cash, 'profit' is the amount which the proprietor has available to spend. Most doubts and disagreements lie in the contrast between sales revenue and related costs on the one hand, and accretion to total value on the other.

Turning to specific problems, Mr Norris said: 'If the auditor were left to his own devices in valuing the stock of many businesses, it would be very difficult for him, unaided by the personnel of the company, to arrive at a figure. He should rather satisfy himself that those personnel have carried out proper procedures.' As a principle, Mr Norris opposed the inclusion of fixed overheads (of which any manufacturing company has 'quite a sizeable chunk') in stock valuation, as this amounts to anticipating profit that has not been realized in sales.

Auditors had formed an attachment to consistency, often in preference to any kind of abstract principle and possibly as a constraint on bias by the directors. 'But consistency and conservation come very low in the scheme of things. If they ever had the title of an accounting principle, I would like to deprive them of it.'

Validity of consolidated accounts

According to Mr Norris, consolidated accounts are one step removed from the relatively scientific ascertainment of an individual company's figures, and are to that degree less valid, particularly in such matters as 'goodwill' which arises from surpluses on consolidation.

He was 'a little unhappy' with the recent exposure draft on associated companies' results. In his own experience, joint venture activities were often conducted through the medium of ad hoc companies, whose profits are at one remove from one's own results. It also happened that willingness to admit to 'participation in management' was sometimes influenced by profitability!

He referred also to the diminishing value of the £ sterling and to the theory of replacement cost accounting: on the changing value of money, he believed that it was 'wrong to deduct apples from pears'. In a period of inflation, the depreciation provisions of many companies tend to be understated, and profits overstated.

Whereas some speakers had suggested that all was reasonably well except for some limited areas of difficulty, Mr Norris plainly held other views. 'I would have thought that we had many things to be ironed out' he said. 'Professor Stamp has done good service in provoking us into thinking what we ought to be doing.'

'There is an increased degree of urgency in considering where we as an Institute stand on this matter. I am very much in favour of the Institute proceeding with its efforts to promote better practice, but I believe there is in the long run no substitute for personal judgment.'

A practitioner speaks

Mr Norris was followed by Mr P. G. Corbett, F.C.A., of Messrs Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Co, who stressed the perils of mandatory instruction without regard to the particular case. There was a book titled HOW TO HUG which proved on closer examination to be volume XIII of an encyclopedia!

Much of a company's affairs had to remain confidential, and accounts must be comprehensible to the reader. However, these constraints change, and much that would have been regarded ten years ago as confidential or incomprehensible was now neither.

A superficial similarity between cases may hide underlying differences. Thus with investment grants, if the plant would have been purchased anyway the resulting grant should be credited to reserve: but if availability of the grant was a crucial factor in the directors' decision to purchase, then there was a good case for deducting it from the cost of the plant. Thus realities come back to the state of mind of the directors.

Mr Corbett favoured a profit and loss account including in a single document everything (other than new capital) that contributes to a change in net assets. He suggested that operating items should include 'everything that the company gets involved in in the normal course of its business', and that recurrence was not necessarily a test of an 'operating' item. 'Adjustments to prior years' operating results' should be limited to cases in which it had been impossible at the earlier date to assess the probable outcome (and which therefore should strictly have given rise to a qualification in the audit report at that time) and 'exceptional' items were those which, although arising out of the normal course of business, were not foreseen and had not been included in fixing selling prices – for example, litigation, changes in excise duties or an abnormal bad debt. He referred to section 12 of the Institute's recent Survey of Published Accounts which, he said, showed 'total anarchy' at this point.

The President, Mr C. Croxton-Smith, M.A., LL.B., F.C.A. (right) and Mr Stanley Kitchen, F.C.A., a member of the Council.

In evaluating a vertically integrated company, profit in relation to value added was more relevant than profit on turnover. However, of the 300 companies surveyed by the Institute, only ten showed a connection between turnover and profit, and six of those used a single global figure as 'cost of sales'. Division of costs by such functions as manufacturing, distribution and selling, administration and finance should present no difficulty in comprehension but might offend against confidentiality.

Associated companies

The flexible element of 'about 20 per cent' in the recent exposure draft on associated companies was 'a notable victory for reality over objectivity'. Otherwise we should have seen an 'outcrop' of 19.9 per cent fringe companies. At the same time, the new proposals called in question the logic of consolidating the 'attributable' profits of a 50 per cent company on one hand, and the whole profit of a 51 per cent company (with subsequent adjustment for minority interests) on the other. There were potential balance sheet problems, since it was easier to consolidate 51 per cent of profit than 51 per cent of a fixed asset or an overdraft, but there is a case for further consideration.

The American approach

On Saturday afternoon Mr Leonard Spacek, C.P.A., of Messrs Arthur Andersen & Co, presented 'The American accountant's approach'. In the course of his address, he said:

'The question posed by this title is a simple one, one which the public has a right to ask. In turn, the public should be entitled to receive a simple direct answer at least in conceptual form. This is the kind of question that makes us face up to the reason for our most serious inadequacy – failure to define the objectives of financial reporting.'

'My views on accounting problems do not arise from a theoretical concern about the public need of the professional accountant's services. I take that need for granted, based on my practical experience, because that requirement is self-evident in any highly industrialized and developed society. My views stem from the problems of getting on with the job of meeting that need.

Need for independent reporting

'Our profession is an important part of the guidance systems of our respective economies. But if we fail as a profession to define our objectives clearly, and thus fail to achieve quality work that we ask the public to accept on faith, the overall guidance system of our national economies will fail the public. Our work can prevent financial failures in our countries, or at least keep them to a minimum, if our accounting clearly portrays the facts as to unfavourable and deteriorating conditions when they arise, so the public can take informed action on what it is told.

'We cannot simply set up a body of practices and procedures that appeal to us, call them accounting principles, and assume that if we follow and observe them, this alone will constitute the discharge of our responsibility and therefore will be an adequate defence for us. Principles determined on this basis are self-serving to accountants; they are useless to the public, and they are held in contempt by business managers. Accounting principles will constitute an effective defence for us only if they are soundly conceived to attain the defined objectives of reliable and informative financial reporting to the public.

'Profit as now reported is the consequence of observing a great number of accounting practices which we and the business community have been in the habit of following. These practices were not adopted because they were designed to arrive at some objective standard of measuring profit. They were adopted as patchwork compromises at one time or another. Their repetitive use is like copying last year's working papers in making this year's audit, a sure way to repeat all previous mistakes.'

Means to an end

'The means to an end have tended to become more controlling than the end result. For instance, the recognition of fair value in reporting is often rejected because of the difficulty in determining it. We then devise an accounting principle as a substitute for fair value, such as cost. Cost is, of course, ordinarily the best evidence of value at date of prudent acquisition, and it has continuing usefulness if coupled with depreciation, provided that price levels remain stable.

'But we proceed to lose sight of the real objective – the reflection of fair value – and to become content with the poor substitute, which is cost. The consequence of this practice is the crediting of capital to profit. The cumulative effect of this specific erroneous practice is far greater in the United States where it is fostered by government to conceal the effects of inflation, than it is in the United Kingdom where you recognize fair values from time to time when cost has lost its usefulness as a measure of asset value.

'Another reason for resisting changes that eliminate obsolete accounting practices is that we are loath to change methods to which we have become accustomed. Our present attitude applies yesterday's obsolete practices as today's required principles. They would be rejected out of hand if we would first identify the objectives which should control them.

'A compass shows the direction to a given point; but in following the direction shown by that compass, one does not necessarily travel in a direct line. To get to the desired point, it is sometimes necessary to digress temporarily by turning off a straight-line course to avoid mountains, storms, or other impediments.

'A unilateral determination of objectives by one firm would serve no useful purpose to it, to its clients, or to the profession. Our Courts have stated clearly that the individual accountant has no defence against failure to fulfil his responsibility for fair presentations irrespective of what so-called generally accepted accounting principles may call for. At present in the United States, the public accountants are between the devil and the deep blue sea. Which term refers to our Courts and which to our accounting principles I will leave to your speculation.'

Basic objectives

'We can describe in rather short, simple language the objectives of our three basic financial statements, if we release our ties to all existing accounting principles and practices that we use. The definition of objectives for the balance sheet, income account and cash-flow statements should not be complicated or burdened with extensive rhetoric. They should be like the Ten Commandments – simple and to the point.

'These objectives would represent the ideal as to what investors and other laymen could reasonably be expected to want in a fair presentation of financial position, results of operation, and cash flow. But, we cannot expect to achieve perfection in accounting any more than we can expect perfection in any other line of human endeavour.

'As previously noted, a compass always points the exact direction, even though to follow that direction it may be necessary or advisable to digress from a straight-line movement because of overriding practical obstacles. Practical obstacles always will be present in seeking to achieve reporting objectives, but the digressions caused by such obstacles should be clearly identified so we can recognize and measure them.

'It is difficult to contain one's excitement in contemplation of the progress that would be made in the United States in the determination of what profit is if the profession would but define the purpose of financial statements in a sufficiently simple manner to be understood by the public.

'Defining these objectives of financial statements will give to the accounting profession the overall controlling target that the Hippocratic oath gave the medical profession in 400 B.C., which has lasted for centuries among all nations, all continents, all tongues, and all races.'

Conclusion

In the course of his final summing-up, Mr Morpeth remarked that those who had spoken as users of accounts had been less critical than might have been expected. He hoped that this was not equivalent to being damned with faint praise.

The problems of judgment had been recognized, but it was clear that more information was needed, and confidence in it. Increasing importance was being attached to such concepts as earnings per share, the quality of profit and the assessment of risk. The definition of objectives was of primary importance, and accountants now had a clearer idea of what was wanted.

'We have been made to think of ourselves and our tasks in a new light', he said. 'I think we can leave here stimulated and not downhearted.'

Intellectual Property and Tax

The recent publication of the report of the Committee appointed under the chairmanship of Mr M. A. L. Banks to examine the British patent system and law, and of the Convention establishing the World Intellectual Property Organization, has led H. S. A. Macnair, F.C.A., to consider some of the tax aspects of a profitable realization of such property.

THE Banks Committee on the British patent system commented that there is not at present a definition of know-how which is universally accepted as satisfactory (Cmnd 4407, Chapter 19). Know-how can range from a trick of the trade to a large collection of drawings and instruction manuals dealing with the running of a technical plant. The committee defined it as technical knowledge of industrial significance which has been built up in one organization and is not in the public domain. This latter characteristic requires to be emphasized because it is the secrecy of the information in question which gives it a saleable value.

In Jeffrey v. Rolls-Royce Ltd (41 ATC 17; 40 TC 443), Lord Radcliffe discussed the character of know-how as contrasted with such independent legal rights as patents, copyright, trade-marks, or goodwill. He described it as an ambience that pervades a highly specialized production organization and thought it correct to rank it as fixed capital so long as the manufacturer retains it for his own productive purposes and expresses its value in his products. However, it is the kind of intangible entity that can easily change its category according to the use to which the owner decides to put it, indeed, the learned judge likened know-how to a fluid in store which can be pumped down several channels.

The better mousetrap

Ralph Waldo Emerson is credited with the saying that the world will make a beaten path to the door of the inventor of a better mousetrap, though he build his house in the woods. Lord Donovan took up this theme in Musker v. English Electric Co Ltd (43 ATC 119; 41 TC 556) when he declared that a payment received for teaching a rival how to make a particular product efficiently and economically falls to be regarded as remuneration for service. Only if there are exceptional circumstances can it be argued successfully that the transaction represents the sale of an asset.

The decision in Evans Medical Supplies Ltd v. Moriarty (36 ATC 277; 37 TC 540) seems to have been a borderline one and is partly explained by the refusal of the parties to agree to any apportionment of the sum in dispute between the elements of know-how and exclusivity. The latter term merely identifies one aspect of goodwill – the absence or weakness of competitors, a weakness attributable in some cases to their own voluntary acceptance of restraints enforceable at law, as illustrated by Home Counties Dairies Ltd v. Skilton ([1970] 1 WLR 526). The correct view of this type of transaction in tax law seems to favour recognition of both income and capital elements where the subject-matter of the contract embraces both advantages established in the past and facilities to be made available in the future.

The distinctive character of an exclusive licence was established in British Salmson Aero Engines Ltd v. CIR (17 ATC 87; 22 TC 29), echoing as it does the principle so central in tax law that money received for not trading or not working is necessarily exempt, as exemplified in Glenboig Union Fireclay Co Ltd v. CIR (1 ATC 142; 12 TC 427) and Higgs v. Olivier (31 ATC 8; 33 TC 136). Hence in Murray v. Imperial Chemical Industries Ltd (46 ATC 138; 44 TC 175) the Court of Appeal upheld a finding by the Special Commissioners that the disputed sums were divisible equally between capital and income.

Dealings in know-how

For the purposes of legislation introduced in 1968 (now section 386 of the Taxes Act 1970) know-how means any industrial information and techniques likely to assist in the manufacture or processing of goods or materials, or in the working of a mine, oil-well, or other source of mineral deposits (including the searching for, discovery, or testing of deposits or the winning of access thereto) or in the carrying out of any agricultural, forestry, or fishing operations.

A general rule is that where (after March 19th, 1968) a person disposes of a trade or part of a trade and, together therewith, of know-how used therein, any consideration received by him for the know-how is to be dealt with as a payment for goodwill. This treatment is enjoined as to both the donor and the person acquiring the know-how if that person provided the consideration. This rule is expressed to apply for the purposes of corporation tax, income tax, and capital gains tax, but it is inapplicable in two situations.

Both the persons concerned may opt out by a written election given jointly to the Inspector within two years of the disposal. The second possibility is that the know-how arose in a trade carried on wholly outside the United Kingdom and in that event the rule does not apply to the person acquiring it. However, neither of these exclusions is available where the sale is effected between bodies of persons under common control. In this connection the terms 'body of persons' includes a partnership. Nevertheless, a distinction which requires to be made where the same individual acts in distinct fiduciary capacities may be seen in CIR v. Lithgows Ltd (39 ATC 430; 39 TC 270) which arose under comparable legislation now found in paragraph 1 of Schedule 7 to the Capital Allowances Act 1968.

It will be seen, therefore, that within a group of companies or as between partnerships and service companies it is only as goodwill that know-how has to be dealt with. In most situations this would involve a computation of chargeable gain or loss, with possible recourse to the 'no gain, no loss' computation prescribed for suitably constituted groups by paragraph 2 of Schedule 13 to the Finance Act 1965 and perhaps in other circumstances to the 'roll-over' provisions operated within class 5 (goodwill) in accordance with section 33.

Writing-down allowances

Subject to the above limitations, the general rule for relief is that where after March 19th, 1968, a person acquires know-how for use in a trade carried on by him, or subsequently commenced, writing-down allowances are to be made to him in taxing the trade during a writing-down period of six years beginning with the chargeable period related to the expenditure. These allowances are not to duplicate any other relief and the mechanics of the relief follow the pattern set by section 76 of the 1968 Act. What is done is to allocate the expenditure ranking for relief over the writing-down period in such a manner that each chargeable period falling within it is allocated a proportionate allowance on a time basis. The writing-down period does not begin until the commencement, in the case of a new trade, but section 386 of the Taxes Act grants a balancing allowance equal to the whole amount of the unutilized expenditure if the person acquiring the know-how ceases to carry on the trade.

A not unreasonable corollary of the foregoing arrangements for relief is the provision which causes the amount or value of any consideration received to be treated for all purposes as a trading receipt on the part of the person disposing of it, in a case where the know-how has been used in a trade carried on by him and he continues to carry on that trade after the disposal. However, this rule seems to extend to disposals of know-how in existence otherwise than by purchase and it appears apt to cover the receipts in dispute in the Rolls-Royce case (above).

Position of inventors

The charge under section 386 is not to duplicate tax imposed on other grounds. In the absence of a charge as above, any consideration received by a person for the disposal of know-how is to be dealt with under the 'sweeping-up' provisions of Case VI of Schedule D. However, where the person concerned has incurred expenditure wholly and exclusively in the disposal or acquisition of the know-how, the outlay is permitted to reduce the amount chargeable, if not otherwise relieved.

An important proviso is that in the case of an individual who devised the know-how in question, whether alone or jointly with any other person, the amount chargeable is to be treated for all purposes as earned income, so as to attract the reliefs granted for income tax by section 9 (1) and for surtax by section 28 (1) of the Taxes Act 1970. This rule is closely in accord with that in section 382 applicable to a person who pays any fees or incurs any expenses in connection with the grant or maintenance of a patent, or the obtaining of an extension of a term of a patent, or a rejected or abandoned application for a patent. Section 385 allows such expenses to be relieved against patent income only, but earned income relief is made available by section 383 against any income from patent rights arising to an individual where the patent was granted for an invention actually devised by him, alone or jointly.

There is, however, a limitation to exclude relief for income from rights which have at any time belonged to any other person. It is interesting to notice here that the Banks Committee did not favour proposals for reducing the Patent Office workload by means of a system of 'petty patents' or the protective deposit of secret documents intended to enable the inventor to work his own device without being vulnerable to an action for infringement on the basis of a full patent established at a later date.

Restrictive covenants

A somewhat provocative feature of the 1968 legislation is consolidated in section 386 (8) which provides that where, in connection with any disposal of know-how, a person gives an undertaking, whether absolute or qualified, and whether legally valid or not, the tenor or effect of which is to restrict his or another's activities in any way, then any consideration received in respect of the giving of the undertaking or its total or partial fulfilment is to be treated for the purposes of the know-how rules considered above as consideration received for the disposal of the know-how.

Is this intended to catch the exclusivity agreements which generated capital sums in the cases noted above and in Wolf Electric Tools Ltd v. Wilson (47 ATC 402)? Or is it a gesture of irritation at such random escapes from the tax net as led to the formulation of what is now section 34 of the Taxes Act 1970? The phraseology in both places is almost identical. Section 34 consolidates a charge to surtax introduced in 1950 to avert a method of remunerating executives founded on the decision in Beak v. Robson (21 ATC 397; 25 TC 33). However, what is sauce for the goose should be sauce for the taxpaying gander and it would seem that consideration moving in this way should attract relief as know-how, thus overcoming the position which arose in Associated Portland Cement Manufacturers Ltd v. Kerr (24 ATC 272; 27 TC 103).

The convention establishing the World Intellectual Property Organization (WIPO) entered into force on April 26th, 1970 (Cmd 4408). In the English text the term 'intellectual property' includes rights relating to literary, artistic, and scientific works; performances of performing artists, phonograms, and broadcasts; inventions in all fields of human endeavour; scientific discoveries; industrial designs, trade-marks, service marks, commercial names, and designations; protection against unfair competition and all other rights resulting from intellectual activity in the industrial, scientific, literary, or artistic fields.

Intellectual property regulations

The more immediate objective of WIPO is to raise the status of the International Bureau of Intellectual Property, and to harmonize arrangements instituted under the Paris Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property and the Berne Convention for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works. The Banks Committee suggest that international co-ordination of patent recognition is proceeding only slowly. At all events the UK position codified in the Copyright Act 1956, the Registered Designs Act 1949, and the Design Copyright Act 1968 is not likely to be overturned in a hurry.

One of the matters required to be treated as a distribution for the purposes of the wider definition applicable to 'close' companies concerns so much of any rent, royalty, or other consideration paid or given by such a company to a 'participator' for the use of intellectual property, as represents more than a reasonable commercial consideration. The property here in view is the copyright in a literary, dramatic, musical, or artistic work within the meaning of the Copyright Act 1956, or any corresponding right under the law of a country to which that Act does not extend (section 284 of the Taxes Act 1970). Moreover, the provisions of section 294, intended to modify the impact of the 'shortfall' rules where a company goes out of business, are extended to connected creditors for reasonable obligations outstanding as above.

It may be observed that a 'literary work' includes any written table or compilation, a 'dramatic work' includes an entertainment in dumb show if reduced to writing in the form in which presented, and an artistic work is defined as a work of artistic craftsmanship, architectural buildings or models and (irrespective of artistic quality), paintings, sculptures, drawings, engravings, and photographs. However, the Taxes Act is silent on the matter of a registered design, 'design' meaning features of shape, configuration, pattern, or ornament applied to an article by any industrial process or means, but exclusive of merely functional specifications.

Computer programs

The Banks Committee commented that because of the nature of computer programs they do not seem to fall easily within any existing industrial property legislation and hence there is uncertainty as to possible extent of protection at law. Mention is made of a French rule which excludes patentability of 'financial or accounting methods, rules of games, and all other systems of an abstract nature, in particular programs or sets of instructions covering the operation of a computer'. However, the Banks Committee suggest that patents may have come into being for what are in substance programs, having regard to restrictions placed on the Patent Office's duty of scrutiny in consequence of the influence of R. v. Patents Appeal Tribunal ex parte Swift & Co ([1962] RPC 37).

Tax code for patents

Since 1945 the tax code for patents has comprised a complete system of relief for outlay and recapture on sale, together with the imposition of income tax on gains of a capital nature, a system buttressed by arrangements for collection of income tax at source for patent royalties and capital consideration going abroad. Chapter I in Part XIV of the Taxes Act 1970 aims to amortize expenditure over the effective life of the rights, with a maximum of 17. For this purpose 'patent rights' means the right to do or authorize the doing of anything which would, but for that right, be an infringement of a patent. Moreover, expenditure incurred in obtaining a right to acquire patent rights in the future as respects any invention not yet patented is related forward so far as necessary.

A person not resident in the UK is subjected to a charge to tax on the net proceeds of sale of any rights relating to a patent granted under the laws of the UK. The incidence of the tax may be modified by an election to have it spread over six years. If a resident in the UK sells any patent rights he is chargeable over a six-year period on the appropriate proportion of the net proceeds, subject to a right to elect to have the assessment made in a lump sum. In both cases the charge for an individual is to income tax (and surtax), not capital gains tax.

Spreading of receipts

The UK has not yet sought to emulate the tax haven privileges accorded to artists of merit in the Republic of Ireland. Instead the reliefs to be found in Chapter II of Part XIV concern opportunities to mitigate the incidence of tax in a single year.

Section 389 (1) permits the spreading over two or three years, according to the length of the period of authorship, of a lump-sum payment (including a non-returnable advance of royalties) and also royalties if receivable not more than two years after first publication of the work. The relief is available where the author assigns the copyright to any extent or grants a licence. Section 389 applies to a literary, dramatic, musical, or artistic work, but in the case of a painting, sculpture, or other work of art, where the artist obtains any sum from its sale or by way of commission or fee for its creation, a comparable relief is available under section 392.

An alternative method of relief is obtainable under section 390 where the copyright is assigned not less than ten years after first publication, or an interest is then granted of not less than two years' duration. If the proceeds would have been brought into charge into a single year there is a right to have them spread over the period of the grant, at yearly intervals not exceeding six.

Topics of Professional Interest from Other Countries

NETHERLANDS

The Profession's 75th Anniversary

THE 75th anniversary of the establishment of accountancy as an organized profession in the Netherlands was celebrated recently at a dinner given in Amsterdam by the Council of the Nederlands Instituut van Registeraccountants. Founded in 1895, the Nederlands Instituut van Accountants became the country's first, and subsequently its largest and leading, association of accountants. It was absorbed into the NIVRA in 1967, under the terms of the Registered Accountants' Act.

Speaking to a distinguished company of guests which included HRH Prince Claus of the Netherlands, the President of the NIVRA, Drs W. van Bruinessen, alluded to the reliance which was placed in an accountant's professional opinion by the business community, by investors and by the public at large. The increasing number of accountants employed as executives spoke well for the quality and versatility of accountancy training. The early members of the NIVRA, to their great credit, had recognized from the outset the importance of professional education and training, and a standard had now been reached which was comparable to that of a university degree.

Despite an increase in the number of candidates qualifying from the universities, about two-thirds of the new entrants to the profession in the Netherlands are trained through the Institute's own courses, thanks largely to the considerable time and effort devoted by members to this sphere of the Institute's activities. About 3,500 students are currently attending Institute courses, in addition to its other commitments in accounting and auditing research.

The profession, said the President, was conscious of its public duty to maintain its established standards in the future. He was confident of its continued good relationships with industry, government and all other sections of the community.

SOUTH AFRICA

The COBOK Report

EARLY in 1967 the National Council of Chartered Accountants (SA), recognizing that the time had come for the co-ordination of thinking and forward planning on how best to provide the 'common body of knowledge' that would be required of the newly qualified chartered accountant in the coming years, and particularly noting the growing tendency for potential entrants to the profession to opt for a 'degree first and then a qualification', set up a representative committee to formulate such a common body of knowledge.

In setting out what it considers the common body of knowledge should comprise, the committee has followed the pattern used by the Canadian and American institutes in indicating the depth of knowledge required in each subject included in the proposed curriculum in the three broad levels of thorough knowledge, good working knowledge and general knowledge respectively. The committee recommends that courses in management and management controls, in financing, profit-planning and investment decision-making and in data-processing be added to the present requirements of the curriculum for potential chartered accountants. Changes in direction and syllabus content of some of the courses at present required of Certificate in the Theory of Accountancy (CTA) students are also recommended.

Having regard to the markedly expanded content of the curriculum proposed for the CTA, the committee feels that the substitution of an accounting degree for a CTA is a matter of immediate concern by the profession, and it recommends that ways and means of achieving such a concept, having regard to the suggested link with controlled practical training and the need for reasonable uniformity in the degree structure, be considered.

It is pointed out in the report that the inclusion of additional subjects in the common body of knowledge does not reduce the need for practical training; on the contrary, it is foreseen that there is a need to increase training standards to match the higher educational requirements. It is, therefore, recommended that, in addition to providing suitable practical experience for trainees, practitioners should be encouraged to place greater emphasis on positive training.

It is suggested by the committee that the established system for assessing the suitability of the practices of those applying for permission to engage articled clerks, to ensure that minimum levels of experience and training are provided, should be strengthened in various ways; in order to raise the present level of practical training that the average clerk receives. The committee considers that if greater emphasis is placed on training during the period of service in a professional office and if the standards of such training are controlled by the Board, it should be possible to reduce the period of such service from five to four years, with remissions of up to 18 months for university graduates and 24 months for graduates who are also graduates of business schools.

The report makes the point that there are many principals today who, for no reason other than sheer volume of work, cannot personally undertake the practical training of their clerks. Many clerks are, therefore, left to obtain their own experience, although this is usually under the guidance of qualified professional assistants. The committee therefore recommends that the present form of contract of articles be replaced by training or service contracts, the wording of which should be so framed that it better describes the relationship which should exist between a principal and his student.

The possibility of the establishment of a second or junior tier of accountants, controlled by the present organized bodies, was examined in depth by the committee, having regard to the national interest and to the development of the profession. A number of factors giving rise to the demand for the introduction of a second or junior tier of qualified accountants are set out in the report. The committee concluded that there are compelling reasons for the establishment of such a tier which, whether in commerce or industry, in the practising accountant's office or in practice as secretaries and book-keepers, would be of considerable service to the community.

The report now awaits consideration by the Public Accountants' and Auditors' Board which is the statutory body charged with the oversight of the training and education and examination of articled clerks.

AUSTRALIA

Establishment of Management School Recommended

AUSTRALIA should have a national institution of excellence in the field of management education within the University of New South Wales, according to the report of the Commonwealth Government's sponsored inquiry into management education, whose report was released recently.

Recommendations for the establishment of the new institution follows the conclusion reached by the committee that the availability, quality and relevance of existing programmes are not consonant with Australian needs for trained managerial leadership in the 1970s.

The committee recommended that the new institution should be organized as a semi-autonomous school within the university. Its faculty should cover the whole range of subjects on which any interdisciplinary field of activity like modern management depend.

Also urged by the committee was the establishment of a doctoral scholarship programme for the training overseas countries; treatment of bond interest in reform of the income tax; administrative price regulation in times of present and potential faculty members. The committee saw such a programme as the only means by which the nation could, in the next few years, produce the professionally-trained personnel of the quality needed to staff graduate management faculties.

Funds for the new institution should be provided not only by the Federal Government, but by business itself through an institution such as the Foundation for Australian Management Education. The essential purpose of FAME, which would be modelled partly on a similar British foundation, would be to accumulate and disburse financial contributions of the business community for management education and research. The issue of the report ended speculation whether the committee would support the concept of one advanced school recommended by the retiring Vice-Chancellor of the University of New South Wales, Sir Philip Baxter, a two-school concept favoured by the University of Melbourne, a national school in Canberra favoured in some public service quarters, or a general sharing among universities for the responsibility of management education.

Members of the committee were:

Dr Richard Cyert, Dean of the Graduate School of Industrial Administration in Carnegie-Mellon University, Pittsburgh;

Mr Warren M. Cannon, President of McKinsey & Co Inc., New York, business consultants;

Dr William C. Frederick, Professor of Business Economics, Graduate School of Business, University of Pittsburgh, and Dr Ezra Solomon, Professor of Finance at Stanford University, California.

The recommendations of the committee have already been accepted in principle by the Government, according to the Minister for Education and Science, Mr Bowen, and the acting Minister for Trade and Industry, Mr Sinclair, who released the report.

GERMANY

Conference of Business Economists

THE twenty-fourth conference of business economists took place in Berlin this week under the auspices of the German Society of Business Economists. The speaker at the opening session was Dr Joachim Zahn, a director of the Daimler-Benz Company of Stuttgart - Untertürkheim, on the subject of 'Business tomorrow - a task for today'.

Other subjects dealt with included: economic and technological trends in the next decade; the structure and management of business in the future; adjustments to the market: establishment and opening up of the markets of tomorrow; development of new methods of information and decision making; financial planning and arrangements; the consequences of the introduction of a sliding scale of working times for management and employees; development and future of the Euro-dollar market; the structure of interest and industrial financing in West European countries; economic considerations of large-scale tax reform.

In addition there were group discussions on the legal form of subsidiary companies abroad; problems connected with company pension schemes; selling strategy in develop-boom; economic and legal questions relating to business mergers.

The Valuation of Unquoted Shares – III

This third and final article by R. A. Stockwell, B.A., A.C.A., deals with valuation for the purposes of capital gains tax. A valuation arising for estate duty purposes on the death of a controlling shareholder under section 55 of the Finance Act 1940 is not effective for capital gains tax purposes.

THE concept of share valuation for capital gains tax brings in the market value rules that were required by the Finance Act 1894 for the purpose of estate duty.

The relevant legislation is contained in section 44 (1) and (2) of the Finance Act 1965. It is worth while reproducing the relevant legislation here:

- (1) Subject to the following subsections, in this part of this Act 'market value' in relation to any assets means the price which those assets might reasonably be expected to fetch on a sale in the open market.
- (2) In estimating the market value of any assets, no reduction shall be made in the estimate on account of the estimate being made on the assumption that the whole of the assets is to be placed on the market at one and the same time:

Provided that where capital gains tax is chargeable, or an allowable loss accrues in consequence of death, and the market value of any property on the date of death taken into account for the purposes of that tax or loss has been depreciated by reason of death, the estimate of the market value shall take that depreciation into account.

The capital gains tax legislation contains none of the onerous provisions equivalent to section 55 of the 1940 Act for estate duty purposes. The normal rules outlined in the first section of this paper will, therefore, apply for the purpose of valuing shares for capital gains tax. The reader will recall that the suggested method of valuation of shareholding should depend on the size of the holding as follows:

- (a) Nought to 10 per cent: a nominal value;
- (b) 10 to 25 per cent: a dividend yield position;
- (c) 25 to 49 per cent: a price/earnings ratio position;
- (d) a majority holding: an asset position subject to variation on a price/earnings ratio basis to show up goodwill or badwill.

One point does, however, arise when dealing with a majority holding. A valuation for estate duty will be on a straight assets basis, but when dealing with capital gains tax it is suggested that any valuation of a holding of less than 75 but more than 51 per cent can be discounted by between 10 and 15 per cent to take account of the minority holding being able to block a special resolution. One can even apply this discounting factor where the valuation is on a holding in excess of 75 per cent of the equity share capital and it is suggested that if the holding is less than 90 per cent then a possible 5 per cent discounting factor should be taken.

When valuing on an assets basis, the whole of the assets will be required to be revalued, though certain important differences will occur because there is no equivalent legislation to the onerous restrictions and definitions contained in the estate duty statutes. It is suggested that land and buildings be valued on a similar basis to that applicable to an estate duty valuation under the Finance Act 1960; i.e., that they are subject to an enforceable restriction that they were used or occupied only for the purpose of that business, provided that they are wholly used for this purpose.

The definition of a debenture contained in the 1940 Act has no legal validity for the purpose of a valuation for capital gains tax. Therefore, when valuing equity shares in a private company, a debenture is classified according to its normal commercial definition.

It should be noted that the legislation makes no allowance for the fact that the whole of the assets are to be placed on the market at the same time. It does, however provide that the depreciation in value due to the death of a majority shareholder and perhaps founder of the company, can be taken into account for the purpose of valuing shares for capital gains tax at the date of death.

Under the Finance Act 1940, section 55, a valuation of the majority holding of shares, where the deceased had control of the company within the seven years preceding his death, is not valid for capital gains tax purposes. If, however, the shares in a private company have to be valued for estate duty purposes under the Finance Act 1894, section 7 (5) (i.e., where the deceased did not have control of the company within the seven years prior to his death) then the Finance Act 1965, section 26 (3), provides that the valuation for estate duty shall be conclusive for the purpose of capital gains tax.

Therefore, where minority holdings are involved, a similar value will apply for both estate duty and capital gains tax on the death of the shareholder concerned.

Time apportionment or valuation

As we move further away from April 6th, 1965, the time apportionment formula relating to unquoted shares that was introduced in the 1965 Act is having its 'cushioning' effect constantly reduced. Schedule VI of the Finance Act 1965, paragraph 25, provides that the shareholder may elect that the base value of the shares should be the market value of the holding on April 6th, 1965. The election once made is irrevocable, and is of increasing potential danger as well as of increasing importance. Such an election must be approached with extreme caution.

It is suggested that before any attempt is made to value the shares at April 6th, 1965, when faced with a disposal for capital gains tax purposes, the time apportionment gain is calculated and used as a break-even point. This will give the minimum gain arising. The shares should then be valued as at April 6th, 1965 on a pessimistic basis, to see whether any possible advantage can accrue from making the election. If on this basis the amount of tax payable is substantially reduced, i.e., the break-even point has not been reached, then it is worth while to make the election and commence negotiations with the share valuation division.

It is perhaps worth while to deal with particular legal problems that may arise on valuation of shares which are contained in Schedule VII of the Finance Act 1965. The particular points to note are contained in paragraphs 15, 16, 17 and 18.

Transactions involving gratuitous transfer value derived from assets

Paragraph 15 is designed to prevent any person having control of a company from exercising his control so that value will pass out of his particular shares, and pass into other shares in or rights over the company. The legislation provides that this type of transaction constitutes a disposal of the shares or rights out of which the value passes, by the person by whom they were owned or exercisable. The paragraph applies even if there is no consideration passing.

Valuation of assets disposed of in a series of transactions

The anti-avoidance legislation in paragraph 16 is designed to cover the situation where a person acquires from one or more persons with whom he is connected, either by way of gift or by any other transaction, assets which when valued in aggregate are more highly valued than when valued separately. If this situation arises, then for the purpose of capital gains tax their market value shall be taken to be the higher market value which must be apportioned rateably between the respective disposals which have already taken place.

Transactions between connected persons

Paragraph 17 provides that a disposal and acquisition between connected persons shall be deemed to be at market value, irrespective of any consideration passing. Connected persons are defined in paragraph 21 of Schedule VII of the Finance Act 1965, and paragraph 17 provides that, where an allowable loss arises on a disposal between connected persons, then that allowable loss can only be utilized against a chargeable gain arising on a transaction between the same connected parties.

Shares in a close company transferring assets at an undervalue

Paragraph 18 provides that, if after April 6th, 1965, a close company transfers an asset to any person other than by way of a bargain made at arm's length and for a consideration less than market value, an amount equal to the difference between the consideration and the market value will be apportioned among the issued shares of the company, and on a disposal of any shares by a shareholder, then an amount equal to the amount apportioned above shall be excluded from the expenditure allowed as a deduction from the consideration for the disposal. This effectively means that the difference between the consideration and market value of the asset is apportioned through to the shareholders for capital gains tax purposes.

Perhaps the most onerous of these provisions is that contained in paragraph 16. This particular problem could arise where there is a majority shareholder in a company disposing of his shares in various minority holdings. Each disposal will of course give rise to a chargeable transaction and the gain or loss must be computed. However, if the donee at some point of time acquires a majority holding of shares, then in fact the previous set of transactions must be set aside for valuation purposes and the ultimate capital gains tax will be calculated on a disposal of the majority holding.

The writer has yet to see this particular legislation used in practice and one hopes that the Inland Revenue will interpret it in a commercial sense, for as the legislation stands at the moment there is every legal justification for reopening a transaction that may have taken place a decade before.

The special buyer

As long ago as the *Mann Crossman & Paulin*¹ case and as recently as the *Lynall*² case, the Courts have stated that when valuing shares for estate duty purposes there is no such concept as the special buyer. The late Lord Plender, C.B.E., F.C.A., when giving evidence in the Mann Crossman & Paulin case, emphasized that everybody was in the market, nobody in particular was included and nobody in particular was excluded.

This concept of the absence of the special buyer was confirmed by the Court of Appeal in the Lynall case. Plowman, J., when considering the position of the other directors who were also members of the Lynall family, discounted any possibility of valuation on the basis that they would pay a higher price to retain the ownership of the company amongst the members of the family. Therefore, unless this decision is reversed by the House of Lords with particular reference to the concept of the special buyer, it seems clear that where estate duty is concerned, the special buyer situation must be ignored.

It is, however, submitted that for the purposes of capital gains tax there can be a special buyer situation. This will not apply on a sale to outside parties, nor on death, but will, it is suggested, arise on disposals during the lifetime of an individual. Consider, for instance, the situation of a majority shareholder in a private company who owns 60 per cent of the shares while an outsider owns the remaining 40 per cent. (It is assumed that this outsider is not a connected person for the purposes of paragraph 21 of Schedule VII of the Finance Act 1965.)

It is not disputed that a disposal of that 60 per cent shareholding would give rise to an assets valuation for capital gains tax purposes, but suppose that one-third of the holding is disposed of? Again there is no problem; it is a disposal of a minority holding and will be valued as such. Section 22 (4) of the Finance Act 1965 stipulates as follows:

'A person's acquisition of an asset and the disposal of it to him shall be deemed to be for a consideration equal to the market value.'

Since it seems clear that a similar valuation must apply to both parties, consider the situation of the 40 per cent shareholder acquiring the additional 20 per cent holding for a nil consideration. By virtue of this transfer of a further 20 per cent to him, he has now acquired a majority holding; and it is submitted that where this situation arises between two particular parties, then the valuer must consider both the amount of the holding disposed of in relation to the existing holding and the amount of the holding acquired – again in relation to the existing holding.

In this particular situation it is submitted that a special buyer situation does exist, and the acquiring shareholder will acquire the shares on an assets valuation rather than according to the principles required for valuing a minority shareholding. As the parties are not connected the provisions of paragraph 16 of Schedule VII do not apply. That particular piece of legislation would, however, lead one to believe that the Legislature contemplates a special buyer situation where connected persons are involved, and there is no reason to suppose that the share valuation division would not be amenable to this line of argument even where the parties to the transaction are not connected as in the above example.

Certain special types of company

It is worth mentioning that the share valuation division has revised its concept of valuation on certain types of companies. These fall into two particular categories. The first category is the company holding shares as an investment, i.e., the normal investment holding company. The second category is the company that holds property as an investment, which is treated for the purpose of the close company legislation as having estate income for shortfall purposes.

With the inflation of the last decade, there has been a flight into equity shares by savers trying to preserve the value of their capital in real terms. The growth of unit trusts providing alternatives of income or growth, or a combination of both, have been a feature of the investment pattern in the United Kingdom. Such 'growth' stocks have a low yield and are concerned only with reflecting appreciation in value to either equal or outpace the decline in the value of money.

It is suggested that, when valuing shares in this particular type of company, then the whole concept of valuation of minority holdings as outlined in the first section of this report must be reconsidered. The normal situation in a private company of this type is that the shareholders try to obtain as much income as they can by way of directors' remuneration thus obtaining earned income relief. It is, of course, appreciated that dividends have to be distributed to avoid a shortfall in distributions and the surtax apportionment position, but the dividend policy of these companies is laid down by statute rather than by commercial considerations. Therefore, any valuation of shares for capital gains tax purposes in this type of company should be based on a discounted assets valuation and it is suggested that these particular discounting factors should be somewhere between the following margins:

Majority holdings: A straight net assets basis, with a possible 5 to 15 per cent discount.

26 to 49 per cent: A 25 to 35 per cent discounting factor on net assets.

50 to 75 per cent: A 35 to 45 per cent discounting factor on net assets.

Less than 75 per cent: A 60 to 70 per cent discounting factor on net assets. •

When valuing on this basis, it must, of course, be appreciated that in the shares or property involved there is an underlying liability to capital gains tax. It is understood that the share valuation division will accept a discounting factor of 5 per cent per annum (compound) on the assets valued at the date of disposal to take account of any capital gains tax liability that would arise on the disposal of those assets that are owned by the company.

The appeal system

Where there is a dispute as to valuation for the purposes of estate duty, then the executors or administrators of an estate have the right to go to the Courts to resolve the dispute.

For capital gains tax, the relevant legislation is contained in section 44 (8) of the Finance Act 1965 and the question of appeal is referred to the General Commissioners. There are, in addition, provisions concerning valuations which may affect two or more persons under Schedule X of the Finance Act 1965, paragraph 2.

The purpose of this legislation is that proceedings may be brought before the General Commissioners or, on election, before the special commissioners, but the legislation also stipulates that, in order to take the matter out of the hands of the General Commissioners, the taxpayer requires the assistance of another shareholder in the company concerned. Furthermore, unless the commissioners are erroneous on a point of law their decision is final; and as any dispute on share valuations is more likely to be a question of fact rather than of law, it appears that very few capital gains tax valuations will ever reach the Courts.

As the legislation stands at the present time, and within the constitution of the various bodies of General Commissioners set up over the country, there is the possibility of many an embarrassing situation arising where local businessmen are asked to decide, as a question of fact, matters affecting a colleague or a competitor. One could envisage the registered offices of various companies being transferred to other districts merely to avoid local competitors acquiring any knowledge of a rival's business.

Where shares are ultimately sold

As a closing note to this paper, inequities may arise where shares in a private company are sold to an outside party on a takeover bid. Similar inequities will arise where a company is liquidated and the consideration for the disposal of the shares is the amount of the distributions by the liquidator, either in cash or in specie. In these two sorts of situation, the disposal price of the shares is based on an assets value of the company at the date of sale or date of liquidation.

The majority shareholder will have few problems for capital gains tax purposes. If his shares are valued at April 6th, 1965, then they are valued on an assets basis and he effectively receives an assets price for his shares. If the company's assets have increased in value, then the liquidator will have to meet a 45 per cent capital gains tax liability on the disposal of the asset in question. Similarly on a take-over the buying company will make allowance for the underlying capital gains tax arising in respect of the assets comprised in the shares which it is purchasing.

But consider the situation of the poor minority shareholder. He too will receive a price based on the assets value of his shares, but if one is concerned with a trading company, then any valuation at April 6th, 1965, may take little account of the asset position of the company at that date. Indeed, if the company is a property or investment holding company, then there will be a large discounting factor applied as previously mentioned, so that in either situation the capital gains tax arising on the minority shareholder may be substantially more than that arising on

THE TAXATION PROBLEMS OF CLOSE C

A large part of the business conducted in the United Kingdom is run by "family" companies in which the top management and shareholdings are mainly vested in an individual or a small group of individuals. With such a company there are three types of tax problems – those of the company itself, those of its managers and those of its shareholders – and they all affect each other. The individual or group is usually concerned with the total tax burden of all three and is often particularly concerned with the effect of that burden on the likelihood of the company remaining for the foreseeable future under "family" control.

Apart from the general tax law affecting companies, managers and shareholders, there is much special legislation dealing with "controlled" companies and some of the general law provisions have particular application to such companies.

The object of this conference is to consider in detail the problems posed by these taxes and to explain how far the tax burden can be minimised if appropriate action is taken. There will be six main sessions and two question sessions (as listed in the programme opposite) and the main sessions will be divided between Professor Wheatcroft and his two colleagues, Mr. Lawton and Mr. Carmichael.

The Speakers

Professor G. S. A. Wheatcroft M. A. Mr. J. Philip Lawton, M.A., L.L.M. (Cantab.) is a solicitor, joint Editor of the British Tax Review, Member of the Law Commission Consultative Group on the simplification of Taxes on Land, the author of Tax Planning (4th Ed.) formerly called Tax Planning for the Family Solicitor, and numerous articles on taxation in legal periodicals.

Carmichael is a Fellow of the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales and of the Institute of Taxation, a member of the Editorial Board of the forthcoming new edition of Simon's Taxes, author and editor of a number of books and articles on taxation and director of a number of close companies.

his colleague (the majority shareholder) who has received a greater cash sum on the sale or liquidation. This is the type of situation where the minimization of capital gains tax may necessitate an election for an April 6th, 1965, valuation of the shares held by the majority shareholder and a straight time apportionment of the gain applicable to the minority shareholder.

In view of this type of inequity that can so easily arise, there should be an extra-statutory concession that where members of a family control a company, albeit through separate minority shareholdings, then when valuing on a take-over or a liquidation an assets basis of valuation should apply at April 6th, 1965; i.e., that one person controls the company even though the shareholdings are split between husband and wife and infant children and that the shareholdings of the immediate family should be looked at as one holding. When children reach their majority, then there may be differences of opinion between themselves and their parents, and the Inland Revenue would have good cause for stating that at this point of time they should be treated as separate individuals, but at least the shareholding of a husband and wife could be valued as one entity.

It would seem that in order to avoid the difficulties of a section 55 valuation, the professional adviser may be creating a worse situation with capital gains tax and, whereas prior to 1965 one only had one situation and one difficulty to consider and could advise the client accordingly, now the professional adviser is faced with another set of conditions to be considered, which may mean that he will give advice in good faith on one hand and cause his client difficulty on the other.

It is hoped that it is not too radical to suggest that at the present time share valuations of private companies are in their infancy. It seems highly probable that capital gains tax is here to stay, and the civil service has a substantial body of experts who have a number of years' experience in this particular field. The professions are now beginning to realize that they in their turn must combat force with force and expertise with expertise. If this paper provides ammunition for argument then it will have achieved its object.

Taxation Cases

Full reports of the cases summarized in these columns will be published, with Notes on the Judgments, in
the 'Annotated Tax Cases'

Johnstone v. Heath

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division) –
July 8th, 1970

(Before Mr Justice GOFF)

Income tax – Purchase and sale of land – Land not income-producing – Taxpayer unable to finance purchase himself – No intention to develop – Contract to sell before contract to purchase – Isolated transaction – Whether assessable – Schedule D, Case I.

The taxpayer arranged to purchase 6½ acres of undeveloped land, which was non-income-producing. He was unable to finance the purchase himself, and he did not have the means to service the requisite loan. He had no intention of developing the land. He contracted to sell the land before he entered any contract to buy it. There was a drainage problem connected with the proposed development, and the taxpayer had investigated the possibility of borrowing the purchase price from relatives with the idea of selling when the problem had been solved.

The General Commissioners decided that as the transaction was an isolated one, it was not necessarily assessable as land-dealing; and that it was not an adventure in the nature of trade; and that the profit from the resale was not assessable.

Held: an isolated dealing in land could be assessable, and the General Commissioners' decision was unreasonable in the light of their findings of fact; and the profit from the resale was assessable.

Lowe v. J. W. Ashmore Ltd

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division) –
July 25th, 1970

(Before Mr Justice MEGARRY)

Income tax – Farmer – Sale of turf – Whether receipts of farming business – Whether income from property – Income Tax Act 1952, sections 122, 123, 124, 127, 179, 526 (1) – Finance Act 1948, section 31 – Finance Act 1963, sections 14, 15, 20, 28.

The company farmed a holding consisting of nearly 100 acres, 34 or 35 of which were arable land, two or three were orchards and buildings, and nearly 60 acres permanent pasture. In the period ended March 31st, 1964, the company sold turf for £543 15s and in the period ended March 31st, 1965, it sold turf for £1,440 13s 4d. In all, turf was taken from 26½ acres, and the total sum received was £1,984 8s 4d. The turf was referred to as 'two-inch-thick turf'. It was sold to two companies, from fields chosen by them at a price of £75 an acre. There was no supervision by the company, and the initiative for the sale came from the companies. After the turf had gone, the company ploughed the land and drilled it with corn. The company did not produce turf for resale.

The company was assessed under Case I of Schedule D for 1964–65 and 1965–66 as 'farmers', and also under Case VIII for the first year in respect of 'income from property'. It was contended for the company that the sums in question were capital receipts, and the General Commissioners decided in its favour.

Held: the sums in question were receipts of the company's farming business, within Case I, and were also income from property within Case VIII.

FINANCE AND COMMERCE

Four-point Plan for Rationalization and Control

BY the time shareholders in The General Engineering Company (Radcliffe) received the accounts from which this week's reprint is taken, they had been fully briefed as to why the year's results were so poor. The main reasons, as the company's new chairman, Mr R. B. Ogden, F.C.A., recounts, were the failure to obtain adequate price increases early enough, the continuing high cost of new development, and the high level of overheads established to achieve the past policy of turnover expansion. Coupled with these factors there was a fall in turnover and a reduction in production efficiency aggravated by delays outside the company's control.

Mr Ogden, who joined the board and became chairman on February 19th last – a few weeks before the end of the financial year under review – refers shareholders to the ten-year record with particular reference to the point that, whereas profits reached a peak in 1965 and 1966, turnover continued to increase until 1969. The peak profits arose mainly from an increase in activity due to large overseas contracts which masked the effect of falling markets and profits in certain lines.

Fundamental changes in the constitution of the electrical and allied industries served by the company reduced demand for much of the basic equipment on which the company's prosperity had been built. This left a void which the company set out to fill by new products and large contracts for specialized plant installations.

Weak control

Mr Ogden states that some new products have proved highly successful, while others depended for success on development of substantial turnover. To secure such turnover it was necessary that overheads should rise, leading to a tendency for turnover and overheads to leap-frog and leaving the company vulnerable to inadequate margins. 'The last three years have clearly been a period when strict cost controls were essential', Mr Ogden says, but he admits that 'these have undoubtedly been weak'.

That weakness led to erosion of gross profit through inadequate production control, delay in raising selling prices in relation to rising costs, and the obscuring of judgement of those lines of production which were unlikely to become adequately profitable within a reasonable time.

It has become clear that measures taken by the board when the half-year results became known did not go far enough. Investigation by the reconstituted board showed that the company's needs were essentially of rationalization and control because 'ample and increasing profitable turnover is available'.

There has therefore been action which Mr Ogden puts under four heads. First is a reduction of turnover on certain lines by the elimination of inadequate profit items and also those needing too long a period to establish. This action should raise profitability and contribute to a better liquidity ratio.

Costing reinforced

Then, rationalization of production has included the closing of one works at Radcliffe and the incorporation of its production at the main works. There has also been extensive works and office reorganization to ensure clear and effective controls, better production flow and reduction of overheads; and finally the amalgamation of two separate divisions and their concentration at the main Radcliffe works. These moves led to a measure of redundancy.

The costing department, Mr Ogden reports, has been 'reinforced by senior appointment and the board will ensure the necessary strength of the entire accounting function upon which management decisions so vitally depend'. The major cost involved in the programme related to slow moving stocks and to stocks rendered obsolete and should be covered by the special provision of £30,000 shown in the accounts.

Mr Ogden reports further that an immense amount of work has been done not only to plan the now well-advanced reorganization, but to reflect the results and prospects in budgetary figures. These figures have been professionally vetted, and the board is confident that although the first half of the current year is likely to show a further loss, the full year – all being well – should show a profit.

Solid foundations

The budgetary expansion has been projected into the 1971-72 financial year so that use of financial and productive resources may be planned to the best advantage. Assuming there is no further deterioration in general economic conditions, 'there is no question that on the solid foundations now established and with its undoubted prestige in the industries it serves the group can look forward to a period of growing prosperity'.

Careful control of cash flow will be necessary. Capital expenditure is being strictly limited and, in any event, no substantial requirements are envisaged in the near future. Selective reduction in turnover will lead to some reduction in normal borrowing requirements, subject to the current inflationary trend, as a whole, being contained within reasonable limits.

The group is now organized into three divisions: a Vacuum Products Division designs and manufactures specialized vacuum plant and machinery, produces a complete range of standard rotary pumps, supplies 'turn key' factory installations for cathode ray tube production, and produces chemical and biological waste treatment plant and refuse disposal equipment.

Then a Wire Machinery Division designs and manufactures a complete range of insulating winding and testing equipment for wires and cables, supplies 'turn key' factory installations for telephone general wiring and power cables, and produces a general range of extrusion equipment for blown film and coating applications.

Finally, Trafalgar Engineering Company operates separately as a division in Birmingham, designing and manufacturing paper insulating, bunching, twisting stranding, lapping and assembly machinery for wires and cables complementary to the Wire Machinery Division range, and also makes equipment for the manufacture of wire ropes.

Stock Control

THE principal activities of the Quinton Hazell (Holdings) group are described thus: 'The group is mainly concerned with the manufacture and distribution of vehicle parts for the replacement market and has substantial export markets covering 150 countries in addition to home sales to wholesalers including its own Partco Division. The group also has interests in machine tools ultrasonic and garage equipment and electrical goods.'

Excluding inter-company transactions, turnover during the year to March last was £17.74 million – an increase of £1.3 million on the previous year – and pre-tax profits rose from £852,186 to £1,213,198. Profits have been doubled in two years.

Acquisitions have helped but basically the power behind Quinton Hazell's growth record is super efficient stock control. At the central warehouse at Coventry there are about two million stock items, the most comprehensive range of replacement parts ever gathered under one roof.

Control and selection of stock is achieved in two parts. Every component is recorded on the computer and, in the order make-up area, selection time is minimized by an alphabetically-indexed system which allows parts to be located without reference to catalogue serial numbers.

At the end of the financial year (March 31st), new ICL computers installed at group headquarters at Colwyn Bay and at the Coventry distribution centre went 'live'. 'This', Mr E. Quinton Hazell, the chairman, comments, 'has greatly helped in our costing and machine shops programme and, of course, is a boon to our export and home market sales records and stock control'.

Reviewing Redland

NEW appraisals by new company chairmen are usually interesting. When the new chairman is Lord Beeching, interest is greater than usual. The company is Redland Ltd with, in 1969–70, a turnover of £51.53 million in roofing tiles, sand and gravel, bricks, pipes, engineering, road surfacing and contracting, granite and limestone, concrete products, transport and traffic engineering.

The 1969–70 turnover went against £46.8 million in the previous year but pre-tax profits were £800,000 down at £5.19 million, even though in the latest accounts £1,116,000 was included as the share of overseas associated companies' profits against a mere £179,000 of dividends received the previous year.

Lord Beeching's appraisal is that the decline from the group's former high level of profitability to a more modest one in the UK is largely attributable to the depressed state of the construction industry, and to that extent profits can be expected to recover as that industry becomes more buoyant.

On the other hand, past success and rapid growth of the company have themselves produced a need for both consolidation and new initiatives. Lord Beeching gives the example that although tile and brick profits may improve, there is no prospect that they will again raise the profit of the group's whole activities to an exceptionally high level, both because they have become a relatively smaller part of the whole, and because the market offers little growth prospect.

Although the UK business of the group is sound and healthy, it has no obvious features which will push growth beyond that of the construction industry and the national economy as a whole. By contrast, overseas operations offer scope for expansion of existing activities, although the necessity to finance their growth prevents them making the same cash contribution as successful developments at home.

The Beeching policy for Redland, therefore, is to look for new products with better growth potential in the home market than existing ones. With this in view a 'Planning and Development Director' has been appointed to the board, but Lord Beeching is quick to emphasize that there is 'no prospect of dramatic change in the near future'.

Particularly interesting in the Redland accounts are tables for the contribution to profits and the profitability of products. The products are listed as to contribution in the order in which they are stated in the first paragraph of this commentary. The profitability order switches the first six items around as follows: roofing tiles; engineering; pipes; road surfacing and contracting; sand and gravel; and, finally, bricks. The order of the final four is the same as in the contribution table.

Diversification

SIZE brings problems when diversification becomes a major policy. It was a problem when the London Rubber Company decided to take the emphasis beyond its basic operations in protectives, rubber gloves and other disposable and rubber products. The company's name is now LRC International and one of the early developments was into the wines and spirits trade which is now a substantial operation. Then, in May last year, the ethical pharmaceutical toiletries, proprietaries and household products activities of the group were enhanced by the acquisition of the Eucryl Group.

Of 1969–70 pre-tax profits of £3,010,000, the basic operations referred to provided £2,120,000, with sales 43 per cent of total turnover of £34.84 million. A further 36 per cent of sales (£12.56 million) was represented by the wines and spirits division which contributed only £152,000 to profits, whereas vending automats, accounting for a mere 2 per cent of sales, provided £135,000 of profits. Pharmaceuticals toiletries, proprietary medical supplies, and other products supplied 19 per cent of sales, but showed profits of £603,000.

This end of the group has, since the turn of the financial year, been strengthened still further by the acquisition of certain subsidiaries of Carlton Industries, including names such as Woodward's Grape Water, Wright's Coal Tar Soap, Spa Tooth Brushes, as well as ethical medical supplies and sanitation products. It will be interesting to see how the profit provision breaks down for the current year.

CITY NOTES

THE Trades Union Congress conference and the International Monetary Fund meetings have come and gone, and the latter matched the former in terms of absence of new initiative – not that one should have expected new initiative from either.

Initiative has to come from Government rather than from the governed and at present the Government is, in the time-honoured cliché, playing its cards close to its chest. Now and again a small trump is shown in the manner of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement at the Commonwealth Finance Ministers' conference in Nicosia. But the pattern of the Government's intended policy is still vague and must remain so until the promised legislation concerning trade unions is introduced and also the anticipated White Paper on plans for reducing Government spending – or is it reducing the rate of increase of Government spending?

It would not be surprising if the scope for reducing spending or reducing the rate of increase of it proves narrower than the Government expected. If that proves to be the case then the scope for the promised reduction in taxation is thereby limited.

Under such conditions the stock-markets can hardly be expected to perform particularly robustly. The confidence needed for security investment is still lacking and will not be quickly rebuilt.

In the foreign exchange market speculation brought about by the technical debate on floating rates has subsided and the Bank of England has apparently been able to make a profit in the process. But in both the currency and the security markets the process of waiting and seeing seems likely to last for some time yet.

THE new City offices of The Scottish Life Assurance Co – Scottish Life House – were formally opened by Alderman Sir Denis Truscott, deputizing for the Lord Mayor, Sir Ian Bowater, last Monday. Scottish Life was founded in Edinburgh in 1881 as a proprietary office and became a mutual life office two years ago 'thereby the better to serve the policy-holders for whom the company was created'. Last year the company produced 10,296 new contracts for total sums assured of £55 million and paid to claimants £3 million in death and survival maturities.

There has been a branch of the company in the City of London since the year of the company's formation. Scottish Life House in the City of London is only one of the development projects being undertaken by the company. The first phase of a massive redevelopment in the centre of Newcastle will be completed this autumn.

PROPERTY bond promotion is developing fast. Originally the preserve of two life assurance companies of modest standing but considerable potential, property bond promotion became for a short time an expansion point for property dealers, agents, and owners.

But now the ranks of the property bond managers are being swelled through the highest traditions of that fine old dictum – if you can't beat 'em, join 'em. Unit trust managements are coming into the property bond ranks thick and fast.

Soon it will be a rarity for a unit trust management not to have a property bond link of some kind. The fall in the unit trust net investment inflow to not much more than £5 million in August makes some new unit trust initiative imperative.

If unit trusts cannot sell new units to a profitable degree, then managements will have to find something else to sell. Property bonds are an obvious alternative.

Letters

Replacement Price Accounting

SIR, — I refer to Professor Amey's letter which appeared in your issue of June 11th and regret the delay in replying, having only recently returned from an extensive overseas tour. I am sorry if I have misinterpreted his position. In his letter he denies that he is a proponent of the replacement price system of asset valuation. I can only offer what I took to be clear evidence of his position.

On page 90 of Professor Amey's book (to which my article referred) he gives a section of 'conclusions on valuation'. For indestructible assets, he cites Bonbright: 'The traditional land valuation is, therefore, not notably inconsistent with the replacement-cost theory.' This seems to convey that the replacement-cost theory is deemed by Bonbright to be the touchstone of particular valuations; and Amey's citation of the passage seems to be endorsement of it. For other assets not normally held for resale, the primary basis is said to be current replacement cost, though some provisos are added. For inventories, current replacement cost is said to be appropriate for two differently described parts of the total inventory.

On page 91, the upshot of these several recommendations is given: 'We have recommended current replacement cost or something derived from it as the principal basis of asset valuation.'

With respect, when Professor Amey so clearly says he has recommended replacement cost or something derived from it, it seems difficult to avoid the conclusion that he is a proponent of the replacement price system.

May I question also Amey's proposition, quoted from his book in the letter under reference: 'Valuation simpliciter is a patent absurdity'. This statement is true in respect of all proposals for future action. We must estimate the value of future employments of given resources, and each such valuation will be the product of the operations which each different project entails. The present values of three projects each requiring the immediate outlay of £10,000 may all be different; we may choose that which has the highest present (calculated) value. But none of these calculations can alter the fact that we do (or do not) have £10,000 at present. If we do, in fact, have £10,000 as the result of past events and operations, that factual sum should surely be the basis on which we assess the efficiency of past operations. We cannot judge the efficiency of past operations by reference to figures which are evaluations of future operations.

However, Amey's statement 'Valuation simpliciter is a patent absurdity' is, in his book, set immediately after, and apparently in rebuttal of, a statement of mine to the effect that market resale prices are the appropriate asset measurement basis. Now measurement simpliciter is not a patent absurdity. Measurement, one supposes, is always simpliciter. If we allow our hopes or intentions to affect our measurements, we will begin new projects in the belief that we now have more (or less) means than we, in fact, have. We could calculate neither backwards (for assessment of performance) nor forwards (for choosing new actions) with any assurance that consequential judgements would be dependable.

It seems as though Professor Amey has not noticed the distinction I have repeatedly drawn (in Accounting, Evaluation and Economic Behaviour, and elsewhere) between evaluation of future projects and measurement of things past and present. Or else he disagrees with the distinction. If the latter, I would like to know on what grounds.

Yours faithfully,

University of Sydney,
Sydney, NSW.

R. J. CHAMBERS.

Best Practice?

SIR, — Mr J. R. Frost (September 10th issue) would do well to obtain a copy of the latest accounts of FMC Ltd obtainable from 19-23 Knightsbridge, London SW1. This company has material figures relating to cheques issued but not presented and lodgements with bankers in the course of clearance. These items are separate heads on the balance sheet with the bank overdraft shown as on the bank statement.

Yours faithfully,

Worcester.

J. G. RUDDOCK.

The Future of the Profession

SIR, — It seems to me that many of your correspondents will continue to 'wring their withers' over the vote against integration instead of looking to the benefits of the adverse vote. Those like A. J. Adams are easily discouraged and his somewhat petulant letter in your issue of September 10th epitomizes some of the attitudes being adopted.

You will have gathered that I was in favour of rejection. Without going into all the arguments again, one of the many reasons I voted against it was that I am a little tired of being told to plan for the future as if no one ever does. It is time that some of those existing had some of the benefits of being a chartered accountant instead of being buried in an 80,000-weak membership which integration would have brought. Farsightedness and forward thinking are shibboleths used frequently by the ones who particularly want something to make those who have much more common sense feel that they are not modern and 'with it'. Mr A. J. Adams's comments on the 'rationalization of British industry with all the necessary mergers and take-overs' is a case in point. Already this process has gone too far and great wastage and damage is caused by many of these so-called rationalization schemes!

Let us now look to the future. Our Institute can now show what it can produce in ideas and energy. It has the resources in its membership and in its secretariat.

It is my view that integration would have removed one of the greatest spurs to progress in the accountancy profession as in most other activities, namely, competition. It is on this that we must now build and not on an atmosphere of despair.

May I say, in conclusion, that if the vote had gone the other way, although I would have been against it, I would have worked arduously to make it succeed – unlike (apparently) members such as A. J. Adams!

Yours faithfully,

Hull, Yorks.

E. G. CHADWICK, F.C.A.

Integration Fighting Fund

SIR, – We are pleased to announce that the total contributions to our fund have now reached £2,244, and we therefore propose to close the fund at the end of September. Any surplus over our expenses will be remitted to the Chartered Accountants' Benevolent Association.

We again thank all those who have contributed and we shall be sending to each one a statement of our receipts and payments.

Yours faithfully,

HUGH NICHOLSON,
BRUCE SUTHERLAND.

Tax Congress at Brussels

The International Fiscal Association

THERE were over 700 participants from 30 countries at the 24th Congress of the International Fiscal Association which took place in the Palais des Congrès, Brussels, from September 7th to 11th, under the presidency of Professor Edgar Schreuder, of Belgium.

In an address at the opening session, Dr Mitchell Carroll, President of IFA, referred to the considerable growth of the Association since its foundation at the Hague in 1938. He was followed by the Belgian Minister of Finance, Baron Snoy et d'Oppuers, who spoke on the fiscal aspects of the European economic and monetary union.

The Minister referred to the imperious necessity of fiscal harmonization. This tended to get less publicity than the prospects of a European currency, a common capital market, or the strengthening of community institutions. It was not, however, less essential, he said; for fiscal frontiers could not be abolished till fiscal harmonization became a fact.

Harmonization would cover not only the indirect taxes, in the form of TVA and some of the excise taxes, but also direct taxes to the extent that they impeded a common capital market or distorted both the competitive position of businesses and their investment decisions. The TVA and the excise taxes would be harmonized as from January 1st, 1972.

Effect on investment

Fiscal frontiers in the Common Market could not be eliminated till the rates of TVA were harmonized and the excise taxes were applied uniformly. As the interpenetrations of national economies in the community developed, the Minister said, the incidence of taxation would have an increasing effect on investment and saving.

The influence of taxation on the movement of capital could not be denied, and he referred to such examples as the US interest equalization tax and the German Kuponsteuer für Gebietsfremde as being designed specifically for this purpose. The Belgian withholding taxes were a formidable obstacle to Belgian enterprises being able to utilize Euro-bonds as a source of financing.

Nor were current bilateral treaties within EEC compatible. Of the 30 bilateral treaties in force, double taxation still arose in 16 cases for dividends and in 14 cases for interest. The treaties did not reflect the spirit of the community, and the Commission of the EEC considered that the ideal solution would be the elimination of all withholding taxes. Where member States opposed the abolition, then at least they should ensure that withholding taxes were neutral.

No great progress had been made in the freeing of capital movement in the EEC, stated the Minister, and he observed that there would have to be some fiscal harmonization, notably to promote capital-raising, as well as in the field of fiscal structure and tax base.

Multiple taxation of dividends

Another speaker at the opening session was Baron Jean van Houtte, Minister of State and Professor at the Universities of Ghent and Liège. This subject was 'Reflections on methods of ameliorating the multiple taxation on dividends arising from successive taxation on companies and shareholders'. He stated that there was a considerable difference in the relationship of company and shareholders in the large quoted companies as compared with the rest of the company world, i.e., the closely held companies, and he thought the latter should always have the option of being assessed as a partnership and that the close conjunction of company and shareholder should be recognized. (This method would hardly be attractive if individual tax rates were high.)

The so-called 'classical' system of taxing first company income and then shareholders' dividends was recognized as having a proper legal basis: it recognized the legal separateness of company and shareholder. It was also the easiest to administer on an international basis, so far as purely technical and administrative considerations are concerned (Van den Tempel's report to the European Commission recognized this).

Nevertheless, the conjoint tax burdens on company and shareholder resulted, in many cases, in a totality of tax levy which was extremely heavy. The question that should be asked, said Baron van Houtte, was one of fiscal policy, or even a simple fiscal-political one. Should it be recognized that companies should raise capital by rights issues as well as by borrowings? Surely it must be right to deplore excessive financing by external debt obligations? If it was, then tax policy should be neutral between subscribers' capital and debt obligations. It could not be neutral while profit and dividend were both taxed, while on the other hand, interest on debt obligations was deducted from the assessable profit of companies. •

Prospects of change

All that could be hoped for by way of change, said the speaker, was some amelioration of the present system. This could be done by either a lower rate of tax on distributions, or a tax credit or avoir fiscal (the present French system and the old English system) for shareholders; or a deduction from company assessable profits of distributed dividends.

It was hopeless to ask for uniformity of tax laws, but the very minimum which was required was a common system of indirect taxation; and on direct taxation, elimination of disparities of taxation on profits and dividends. Acceptance of the 'classical' system (successive tax on company profits and dividends) implied effective acceptance of economic double taxation of dividends. It should, however, be modified by the introduction of a tax credit (avoir fiscal) for shareholders, not only inside national frontiers but for dividends crossing the frontiers.

A deduction for companies of dividends paid, as had already been introduced in Belgium on a limited basis since 1967, might be even simpler, said the speaker. This would equate the treatment of dividend payments with interest on loans and bonds, and automatically ameliorate the tax position of companies. This benefited company shareholders indirectly irrespective of their domicile.

Formidable amount of documentation

After the opening, the Congress went into working session on the first subject – the multiple burden on dividends and shares by the taxation of companies and shareholders, and the possibilities of modifying this regime.

Professor Leif Mutén, of Sweden (senior fiscal adviser to the International Monetary Fund) was president of the working session, and the general report was written by Professor Charles Cardyn, of Belgium. Eighteen national reports were contributed, the British one being by H. R. Roe (deputy taxation controller, ICI). A formidable amount of documentation on the subject of the taxation of companies and shareholders was produced at this first working session.

Professor Cardyn identified the various methods used throughout the world to deal with the taxation of companies and shareholders. He followed the analysis made by Professor Schendstock (Annex F to the Neumark Report 1962) and later followed by Professor Van den Tempel (Fiscalité du marché commun, February 1968).

The comment was made in the general report that 'the co-existence of these various methods – which include derogations under bilateral conventions – creates absolutely anarchical conditions in international relations'. The divergencies in result were absurd, because they were not deliberate, and occurred largely because national systems did not always mix well in the international context when dividend flow occurred across frontiers and moved into tax systems differently structured.

The report did not pretend to offer the optimum system for any country, but did try to deal with the adaptation of national systems in the international context. It discussed the possibility of using the system of differentiated rates of corporation tax (i.e. the German system) and concluded that this had problems for permanent establishments of foreign companies, and that it presented difficulties for distributions out of previous years. For exempted profits or profits taxed at reduced rates, it was extremely difficult to apply.

The application of the French technique of avoir fiscal into the international system was also discussed. For reasons that were not very obvious the system did not find favour. Professor Cardyn said that the method involved excessive perfection, a concern for fundamental exactitude, and a perfect correlation of control measures.

Only very brief treatment was given in the report to the proposals made by the Carter Commission for Canada. It was not very clear why Professor Cardyn said these were not suitable for extension into the international field except that they diverged from the dualist conception of company and shareholder.

The method currently adopted in Belgium, namely, the deductibility of the dividend from assessable profits in the hands of the paying company was briefly mentioned. It was recognized that it would bring closer together the tax treatment of dividends and interest. Implementation would be easy and it could result in a rapid response in the capital markets. But it was clearly not acceptable to Professor Cardyn, for reasons not very apparent.

The method favoured by Professor Cardyn was complete double taxation with no specific method of relief – the method, in fact, widely practised at present. He said international projection of the 'double taxation' method created less budgetary problems than any other and mitigated fraudulent practices. It was also less dependent on international checks and balances. The same conclusion was reached by Professor Van den Tempel in his recent report to the European Commission. The acceptance of present methods was based on the theory of 'better the devil we know' and little else.

Few of the contributors to the discussion were able to accept the conclusions of the general report, and the Congress resolution on the subject was indeterminate.

Tax problems of mergers

The second working session, presided over by Mr Alun G. Davies, of Britain, was devoted to the subject of 'National and international tax problems arising from the merger of enterprises'. The general report was prepared by Dr Karl Beusch and Dr J. Thomas, of Germany, and presented by the latter. The British report – one of 18 national reports – was written by Mr Tom Jackson, tax adviser to Selection Trust Ltd.

At this session the expression 'merger' was interpreted as covering only the type where one company entirely lost its identity through the amalgamation, i.e., the 'fusion' type of merger. There was considerable reference, both in the reports and the debate, to the tax problems of international mergers, and to the fact that nothing had been produced by OECD on the subject.

Some useful preliminary work done by the EEC had revealed the extent of the problems arising, and also the immense difficulties in arriving at solutions outside integrated areas like the EEC.

Following the general debate on the subject, a resolution was adopted which included a suggestion that the problem be submitted to the Fiscal Committee of OECD, and that the draft directive on a tax system for mergers proposed by EEC should be examined with a view to application outside the community.

Round table discussions

Three round table discussions were held during the congress. The first, under the chairmanship of M. J. Van Hoorn, Jun., Director, Bureau of Fiscal Documentation, Amsterdam, considered 'Tax problems of the developing countries', covering business income, royalties and other investment income. While the discussions were stimulating, they revealed the same gap between the views of developed and underdeveloped countries, as did the meetings of the UN ad hoc group of tax experts at Geneva.

The second round table, on the tax problems resulting from the budget requirements of the European communities, was chaired by Professor Claeys-Bouwart. The third under Mr M. J. Kauffmann, of Luxembourg, dealt with the provisions of non-discrimination of permanent establishments in regard to national enterprises (article 4 (4) of the model convention of OECD).

It was announced during the Congress that Baron Jean van Houtte (Belgium) would be nominated in October 1971 as President of IFA in succession to Dr Mitchell B.

Carroll. Baron van Houtte has formerly been Prime Minister and Finance Minister of Belgium.

At the next congress to be held in Washington during October 1971, the two subjects will be:

- (1) 'The fiscal treatment of international investment trusts and mutual funds, having regard to the major regulatory and foreign exchange features in the various countries'; and
- (2) 'Criteria for the allocation of items of income and expense between related corporations in different States, whether or not parties to tax conventions'.

The Congresses in 1972, 1973 and 1974 will be held respectively in Spain, Zürich and Mexico.

The social programme at the congress included receptions at the Brussels City Hall, a garden party at the Chateau de Val Duchesse, excursions to Liège and Bruges, and a final banquet in the main hall of the Palais de Justice in Brussels.

A contingent of 49 members of the British Branch at the Congress was led by the Chairman, Mr Alun Davies. The Branch, which now numbers over 300, would welcome new members. The terms of membership are available from the Honorary Secretary, Mr D. N. C. Gray, at 6 St James's Square, London SW1.

Does Britain Need an SEC?

Plain Speaking at BAFA Congress

ONE of the most fruitful results of the first annual conference of the British Accounting and Finance Association, chaired in Edinburgh last week by Professor Edward Stamp, was the prospect of a working partnership between BAFA and the joint Accounting Standards Steering Committee of the three Chartered Institutes.

A proposal was put forward by Sir Ronald Leach, C.B.E., F.C.A., chairman of the Steering Committee, that BAFA should invite The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales to join in sponsoring a study conference on accounting principles in 1971.

A grim warning was given by Professor Maurice Moonitz, Director of Research of the American Institute's Accounting Principles Board, that in over 30 years of discussion and research, the American Institute, acting by itself, has been unable to agree upon a set of generally accepted accounting principles. This was because general acceptance did not depend on accountants alone but upon the consumers of accounting information.

Pros and cons of a British SEC

The theme of this year's two-day conference, the first to be organized by the newly formed Association, was the question: 'Does Britain need a Securities and Exchange Commission to protect the investor and improve financial reporting?' The first day was devoted to an examination of current British needs; the second to an authoritative survey by three of the most eminent American experts in this field.

The conference began with a statement of the case for a British regulatory body by Mr Christopher Marley, Financial Editor of The Times and co-author with Professor Stamp of the recent book Accounting Principles and the City Code: the Case for Reform. Referring to the many cases which have hit the headlines in the last twelve years (from British Aluminium to Pergamon), Mr Marley poured cold water on the self-regulatory attempts of the Stock Exchange, the merchant banks and professional accountants.

On auditing, two short though highly significant quotations must suffice. 'An auditor is the only independent professional to stand between a company's management and its shareholders. He is the only arbiter of financial honesty.' But, went on Mr Marley, 'financial journalists were trained to be surprised and interested at a qualification in an auditor's report. Today we are nearing a situation where surprise and interest ought to be expressed if any set of accounts is unqualified'.

As to the City Take-over Code, Mr Marley felt there was already an embryo SEC in the Panel, and that the 1969 code was a lot less voluntary than it was usually made out to be. He made a case for this situation to be formalized.

This set the scene for a brilliant address by Mr Ian Fraser, Director-General of the Take-over Panel and – in the words of Professor Stamp – the City's watchdog, if not its bloodhound. Mr Fraser traced the evolution of the British concept of financial fair play, from the time of the 'South Sea Bubble' and Charles Grant's clean-up of the East India Company, through to the present day.

The 'English disease', he said, did not include financial immorality in high places; we had nothing like the American scandals of the 1920s involving really top people. In Britain, fraud and insider trading were kept down to tolerable levels by a strong centralized legal system, by the lack of an over-the-counter securities market, by the power and responsibility of the financial press, and by the strong social pressures operating within the City where everybody knew everybody else.

Mr Fraser went on to argue cogently for the preservation of the voluntary, self-regulatory nature of existing British institutions, and against formalization.

Only one of the City 'affairs' of recent years would have attracted the attention of the American form of SEC – the International Paints case. The rest were scandals only because of the highly developed sense of fair play which could not possibly be encompassed by workable legislation. How, asked Mr Marley, did one legislate to prevent controlling shareholders from obtaining a better deal than minorities? The gruesome symptoms of a cancerous growth of legalism and bureaucracy could kill the free London markets, which were Britain's best dollar-earners.

Accounting standards

Sir Ronald Leach's topic was: 'Is a British SEC required to improve financial reporting?' He strongly supported Mr Fraser on the need for voluntary systems of regulation. In relation to the accountancy profession he stressed that even in the USA, the SEC did not normally initiate new work on accounting standards, but expected the American Institute to do so through its Accounting Principles Board. Publication of SEC rules had followed the issue of APB Opinions in some instances, but not in others.

In the course of a wide-ranging survey of British and American practice, Sir Ronald surprised many accountants in his audience by welcoming the responsibility of reporting on profit forecasts. Such forecasts were prohibited in American offer documents on the grounds that a prospectus must contain factual information only.

Acknowledging that the independent accountants' function is to report solely on the accounting bases and calculations leading to the forecast, Sir Ronald continued: 'It must be emphasized, however, that any professional accountant would wish to satisfy himself, so far as lay within his power, that the assumptions made by the directors, who are solely responsible for them, are much more than a pious hope'. He suggested that the GEC/AEI procedure of an independent inquest on a forecast that went wrong was worth developing.

The remaining three conference speakers were qualified accountants from the United States. This produced a change of emphasis: the second day being far more deeply technical than the first, and less concerned with moral values and duties than with practicalities.

First of the three was Mr Andrew Barr, Chief Accountant of the SEC, on the American securities laws, and the history and work-load of the Commission since its inception in 1934. A flood of facts and figures supported his main point that two types of action result from the securities laws for the benefit of the investing public:

- (a) the requiring of disclosures of all material financial and other information offered for public sale; and
- (b) the prohibiting of misrepresentation, deceit and other fraudulent acts and practices in the sale of securities.

He had a very simple explanation for the American use of the expression 'audit certificate': it was in the Act!

Then Mr George R. Catlett, a partner in Arthur Andersen & Co, and Vice-Chairman of the Accounting Principles Board, gave an entertaining account of the work of the APB on which the American Institute spends $400,000 a year and its members an estimated $2 million worth of time.

He pleaded with the academics to look for research topics of direct benefit to the profession in solving everyday problems, and argued that the profession itself should beware of laying down the law on matters affecting the regulation of business conduct.

American experience

Finally, Professor Moonitz contributed a lucid analysis of what went wrong with the efforts of the APB and its predecessor, the Committee on Accounting Procedure (formed in 1939). The APB has issued fifteen Opinions (which were binding) and three Statements (which were not), and it had sponsored the publication of research studies by individual authors, including Professor Moonitz himself. (In an aside clearly derived from bitter experience, he counselled against the policy of asking directors of research to do any important work on research studies themselves!).

In a brief review of APB Opinions and their effect, Professor Moonitz indicated that attempts to standardize matters of presentation and disclosure were in general successful, whereas anything touching upon the measurement of income was less likely to gain general acceptance. In the latter category, he emphasized, first, that only where exposure drafts had been circulated widely and for a long time could any measure of agreement be reached; and secondly, that no agreement whatsoever had been possible on the principles and objectives of accounting. He contrasted this situation with the impressive code of auditing standards built up by the American Institute's Committee on Auditing Procedure. Here there was no outside interference and professionals found it possible to agree on standards.

In conclusion, Professor Moonitz gave the following advice to British accountants as they commenced to tread the same path:

- '(a) A set of accounting principles will not evolve as a natural process from the practices of the business community. The forces at work in that community – particularly on the part of management – argue against constraints of any kind, including accounting rules.
- '(2) Do not expect any of your accounting bodies to agree upon a set of accounting principles by itself, much less enforce those principles in practice. The laymen will not let them do the job.
- '(3) If you seriously want a set of accounting principles reduced to writing and applied in practice, you must join together some reasonably objective, independent technical body, such as one of your accounting societies, with an agency with enforcing powers. My knowledge of your institutions is somewhat superficial but, from the outside, the London Stock Exchange and the Board of Trade seem to be admirably situated to do the enforcing. They possess powers greater than their counterparts in America. You may find them capable of doing the constructive things our own SEC has accomplished over the past 35 years without having to go through the bother of establishing another government agency.'

STUDENT ROUNABOUT

London and Birmingham Students at Oxford

FOR the first time ever, the annual Oxford residential courses of the Birmingham CASS and the London CASS held last week were run concurrently. Birmingham returned to Merton for their 21st course from Wednesday to Saturday and over 200 members of the London Society descended on Balliol and Trinity Colleges on Thursday, remaining until late Sunday afternoon. Both courses must have gratified their respective organizers both by reason of the good attendance and the hard work put in by members.

That two of the largest societies should meet on the same ground provided an ideal opportunity for the respective committee members, course leaders and principal guests to make 'social calls' on one another. In addition, it was only natural that comparisons by one about the other should occur. What was not foreseen, however, was a successful 'raid' by London, who snatched Birmingham's one and only girl member due to attend their guest night dinner at Merton and whisked her back to a place at high table in Trinity for London's guest night dinner. The Hall echoed with prolonged applause when it was announced that the raid was a complete success, and Miss Janice Taylor, the 'hostage', was presented with a magnificent bouquet of flowers and made an honorary member of 'The Taverners'.

- Over at Merton, the incident was accepted in good humour by Birmingham when Mr P. E. Couse, A.C.A., a former Chairman of the Society, read out a letter from London stating that they could have the 'hostage' back in return for two crates of beer. To prove the 'snatch' he held up 'exhibit A' - a bra brought in specially for the occasion. Unfortunately, Birmingham failed to get their revenge in the punt race on Saturday afternoon.

Merton Course

The 93 students who attended the Birmingham Society's course came away very well satisfied with the three days' study. This would not have been possible but for the hard work put in by Mr A. C. S. Hordern, F.C.A., the course organizer.

As last year, the course was divided into two sections - five groups of Part II students, and five groups of Part I students. Each group was led by a young qualified accountant, who was always on hand to help with any queries raised in his particular group. Discussion periods were dispersed throughout the course.

Mr M. R. Harris, F.C.A., began the lectures on Wednesday afternoon with a talk on the business approach to the modern audit. He spoke plainly and at times very humorously on the subject, dividing the modern audit into three sections: firstly, the examination of the business and its control system as the essential foundation of a well organized audit; secondly, the manner in which the auditor can make a positive contribution to the improvement in financial controls and profitability of his client's business; and finally the conduct and control of the audit itself and how this can be operated in the most efficient way.

Case study

Later in the afternoon Mr R. J. Walls, M.A., LL.B., A.C.A., presented a case study in which a fictitious tennis racquet company was 'taken to pieces' by the ten groups individually. The groups were hard pressed to deal in the time available with all the problems which emerged, but many useful points came out and discussions continued long into the night.

Before the final session of the case study, Mr T. A. Hamilton-Baynes, O.B.E., M.A., F.C.A., gave a talk to the whole course on the accountant as valuer. Mr Hamilton Baynes certainly lived up to his name as a speaker and gave a humorous and enlightening talk.

On a sunny Thursday morning, Mr R. C. Ind, B.A., F.C.A., and Mr M. J. Worthington, F.C.A., made it none the less bright by sharing lectures between the Part I and Part II students on accounting for liquidations, consolidated accounts, and accounting for partnerships. Again, time was the enemy and some of the lectures were not completed to the satisfaction of either lecturer or student.

On Thursday afternoon, Professor R. I. Tricker, F.C.A., F.C.W.A., spoke of the tremendous amount of interest in management information systems, and emphasized how valuable these systems would be in the future. The reason for this interest, Professor Tricker stated, was threefold – (i) computer assistance in business systems, (ii) the growing complexity of business decisions, and (iii) the acceleration in the rate of change in business. The rest of the afternoon was 'free' for members to do as they chose, and some went with an organized party to Blenheim Palace.

In the evening, Mr V. H. Johnson, F.I.O.B., chairman and managing director of Page-Johnson Builders Ltd, gave a very amusing talk on his life and work. This was not so much an academic lecture but rather an example of the opportunities open to the entrepreneurs among the students.

To finish the day, a number of students accepted an invitation from the London students to go over to Balliol College to have a beer and discussion on the courses. The former soon ran out but this did not inhibit the latter in any way.

The two lecturers on Friday were Mr J. Martyn, a barrister, and Mr K. S. Carmichael, F.C.A. Mr Martyn spoke to Part I and Part II candidates on the duties of directors and to Part I students only on the law of trusts. Mr Carmichael gave lectures to Part II students on corporation tax – shortfall and, capital gains tax – death; in the afternoon he spoke on loss claims to Part I students, in the familiar and interesting style which has become so well known both to students and members of the profession; a subject which, on the face of it, seemed lifeless and dull was made into an enlightening talk.

On Friday evening, the guest night dinner was held in Hall. Mr P. B. Jones, F.C.A., Chairman of the Joint Lecture Committee, proposed the toast of the College, and Dr R. E. Richard, F.R.S., Warden of Merton College, responded. Among the guests were three members of the Council of the Institute: Mr S. Dixon, M.A., J.P., F.C.A., a Past-President, Mr E. C. Sayers, F.C.A., and Mr R. F. Griffiths, F.C.A., together with Mr F. Withnall, F.C.A., President of the Society, and Mr K. J. Milligan, M.A., F.C.A., President of the senior Society.

On Saturday morning, after a talk on tax reform by Mr B. W. Sutherland, F.C.A., the groups dispersed to discuss the lecture and also the course generally. The overall opinion was that the occasion had been well worth while and interesting.

London Students at Balliol and Trinity

London's course, which was for Final students, dealt in depth with the many aspects of management accounting and was conducted by tutors of Caer Rhun Hall led by Mr John V. R. Anderson, M.A., A.C.A. It was the first residential course of its kind for the London Society to be run by accountancy tutors and its success merited the hope that it will not be the last.

Successive presidents have, in recent years, been urging upon members the need to do something useful for their clients and have emphasized that there should be more in the accountant's life than tax, auditing, and other associated subjects. It was with a view to inspiring practical help to management that CASSL mounted their course.

At the outset, all members were handed a most weighty but useful volume setting out in detail the lecture subjects, case study problems, and some extremely helpful definitions of various accountancy terms. This well-thought-out manual was also intended for further future studies.

There are few who could better Mr Anderson in getting a course under way. Drawing from his considerable store of humorous anecdotes he gently and ably led members into the tunnel of the 'Functions of management and the types of information required'.

At subsequent sessions he coped with a variety of topics – preparation of budgets, including budgets for working capital, and analysis of changes in working capital; marginal costing; break-even analysis and sales mix. He succeeded at all times in retaining a continuity of interest. Mr M. D. George, B.COM., A.C.A., also showed his skills in lecturing when he spoke on such subjects as investment appraisal and standard costing.

The study groups, a necessary and valuable part of any residential course, worked hard in consolidating on the many aspects which emerged from the lectures. Some members commented upon the fact that the education committee might well consider a qualified accountant as group leader for future courses as in the case of the Birmingham CASS.

Question and answer session

An interesting feature of the course was a question-and-answer period on the practical application and requirements of management when Mr C. J. Peyton, F.C.A., director and secretary, The Rover Co Ltd, answered questions put to him by Mr Anderson. So interested were the audience that the discussion was many times interrupted by questions from the body of the hall.

Introducing the session, Mr Anderson said to Mr Peyton, 'We have discussed the need for top management to create the right environment in which all levels of management can make decisions and we have also discussed the need for communication between top management and its subordinates. How do you manage to do this in the motor industry, i.e., how do you fix the objectives in the long-term and the short-term?'

Replying, Mr Peyton said, 'The objectives of my company both short and long-term are detailed in the operating budgets which are formulated after discussion with all the top managers concerned, they in turn consulting their own managers before making their proposals. The budgets are prepared on the basis of the sales forecast which is compiled from advice by market research after consultation with all overseas divisions.'

Mr Peyton went on to say that the sales budget, had, of course, to be matched to the productive capacity of the factory, details of which were supplied by the planning department who had complete details of the capacity available to produce all the units and spare parts in the specifications. The figures were prepared for the forthcoming year and this was known as the profit budget and were prepared for the following four years which, when allied to the profit budget, became the five-year profit plan.

In addition to the profit plan, estimates of the capital expenditure required to implement the sales programme and to maintain the factories were prepared in detail.

Mr Anderson then asked: 'We hear a lot about return on capital but no one seems to agree on the meaning of capital. How would you see it and would it be a rude question to ask what rate of return you aim for?'

Mr Peyton said that his company regarded capital as all the assets employed in the business less the current liabilities, adjusting for liabilities which were deferred such as taxation, purchase tax, etc. 'We aim for a return on capital of 20 per cent before tax on the capital employed.' It should be remembered, he said, that the fixed assets were only included at balance sheet values and not at current replacement values although, of course, there was a case for including fixed assets at current values bearing in mind that the majority of the current assets and liabilities were on this basis.

Appreciation

The Society were once again fortunate in having Mr Godfrey B. Judd, M.A., F.C.A., as course chairman. The Society would indeed have to look far for someone to match his delightful sense of humour which was appreciated by members and lecturers alike. Nor did the hard administrative work put in by the secretary, Mr Derek du Pré and his assistant, Miss Joyce Taylor, pass unnoticed. Mr Judd presided at the two guest night dinners at Balliol and Trinity when the principal guests included the Society's President, Mr G. R. Appleyard, F.C.A., Dr C. A. Jones, lecturer in Spanish at Trinity, and Mr Alan Brown, Vice-Provost of Worcester College.

OBITUARY

R. W. Smith, O.B.E., T.D., F.C.A.

We have learned with much regret of the death of Mr Ronald William Smith, O.B.E., T.D., F.C.A., announced under 'Professional Notices' on this page. Senior partner in the firm of Day, Smith & Hunter, Chartered Accountants, of Maidstone, he was well known to members of the Institute, particularly in the area of the South Eastern Society, and for many years was correspondent on farm accounting subjects to The Accountant. We are indebted to a partner in his firm for the following appreciation.

APPRECIATION

R. W. Smith was educated at Colfe's Grammar School and was articled in 1928 and qualified in 1933, being placed second in the Intermediate examinations and third in the Final.

He finished his articles with the late Alderman W. Day, Jnr., of Maidstone, and continued with the firm, becoming a partner in 1937. As a keen Territorial he went to annual camp in August 1939. It was indeed a long camp as he did not arrive back in Maidstone until early 1946. In the meantime he had served in the RASC with the 44 (Home Counties) Division in France and was later a founder Company Commander in the newly formed Sixth Armoured Division. Afterwards he joined the staff of First Army which merged into Allied Forces HQ in North Africa. He stayed with this formation until the Italian campaign was nearly over and then moved to the British Military Mission in Greece. Awarded the OBE in 1943 and twice mentioned in dispatches as well as gaining the TD and Clasp, he held the rank of Lieut. Colonel.

He energetically set about rebuilding the practice at Maidstone which had been considerably reduced during the war and played a busy and notable part in its successful rejuvenation. In spite of this strenuous activity he found time to devote many hours of work on Institute affairs, serving for several years on the Committee of the South Eastern Society and becoming its President in 1952. He was co-opted and served on many of the Institute sub-committees and recently served as an Inspector for the National Ports Council.

In public life he was Chairman of the Governors of Maidstone Technical College for a considerable period

STUDENT ROUNABOUT

London and Birmingham Students at Oxford

FOR the first time ever, the annual Oxford residential courses of the Birmingham CASS and the London CASS held last week were run concurrently. Birmingham returned to Merton for their 21st course from Wednesday to Saturday and over 200 members of the London Society descended on Balliol and Trinity Colleges on Thursday, remaining until late Sunday afternoon. Both courses must have gratified their respective organizers both by reason of the good attendance and the hard work put in by members.

That two of the largest societies should meet on the same ground provided an ideal opportunity for the respective committee members, course leaders and principal guests to make 'social calls' on one another. In addition, it was only natural that comparisons by one about the other should occur. What was not foreseen, however, was a successful 'raid' by London, who snatched Birmingham's one and only girl member due to attend their guest night dinner at Merton and whisked her back to a place at high table in Trinity for London's guest night dinner. The Hall echoed with prolonged applause when it was announced that the raid was a complete success, and Miss Janice Taylor, the 'hostage', was presented with a magnificent bouquet of flowers and made an honorary member of 'The Taverners'.

Over at Merton, the incident was accepted in good humour by Birmingham when Mr P. E. Couse, A.C.A., a former Chairman of the Society, read out a letter from London stating that they could have the 'hostage' back in return for two crates of beer. To prove the 'snatch' he held up 'exhibit A' — a bra brought in specially for the occasion. Unfortunately, Birmingham failed to get their revenge in the punt race on Saturday afternoon.

Merton Course

The 93 students who attended the Birmingham Society's course came away very well satisfied with the three days' study. This would not have been possible but for the hard work put in by Mr A. C. S. Hordern, F.C.A., the course organizer.

As last year, the course was divided into two sections — five groups of Part II students, and five groups of Part I students. Each group was led by a young qualified accountant, who was always on hand to help with any queries raised in his particular group. Discussion periods were dispersed throughout the course.

Mr M. R. Harris, F.C.A., began the lectures on Wednesday afternoon with a talk on the business approach to the modern audit. He spoke plainly and at times very humorously on the subject, dividing the modern audit into three sections: firstly, the examination of the business and its control system as the essential foundation of a well organized audit; secondly, the manner in which the auditor can make a positive contribution to the improvement in financial controls and profitability of his client's business; and finally the conduct and control of the audit itself and how this can be operated in the most efficient way.

Case study

Later in the afternoon Mr R. J. Walls, M.A., LL.B., A.C.A., presented a case study in which a fictitious tennis racquet company was 'taken to pieces' by the ten groups individually. The groups were hard pressed to deal in the time available with all the problems which emerged, but many useful points came out and discussions continued long into the night.

Before the final session of the case study, Mr T. A. Hamilton-Baynes, O.B.E., M.A., F.C.A., gave a talk to the whole course on the accountant as valuer. Mr Hamilton Baynes certainly lived up to his name as a speaker and gave a humorous and enlightening talk.

On a sunny Thursday morning, Mr R. C. Ind, B.A., F.C.A., and Mr M. J. Worthington, F.C.A., made it none the less bright by sharing lectures between the Part I and Part II students on accounting for liquidations, consolidated accounts, and accounting for partnerships. Again, time was the enemy and some of the lectures were not completed to the satisfaction of either lecturer or student.

On Thursday afternoon, Professor R. I. Tricker, F.C.A., F.C.W.A., spoke of the tremendous amount of interest in management information systems, and emphasized how valuable these systems would be in the future. The reason for this interest, Professor Tricker stated, was threefold – (i) computer assistance in business systems, (ii) the growing complexity of business decisions, and (iii) the acceleration in the rate of change in business. The rest of the afternoon was 'free' for members to do as they chose, and some went with an organized party to Blenheim Palace.

In the evening, Mr V. H. Johnson, F.I.O.B., chairman and managing director of Page-Johnson Builders Ltd, gave a very amusing talk on his life and work. This was not so much an academic lecture but rather an example of the opportunities open to the entrepreneurs among the students.

To finish the day, a number of students accepted an invitation from the London students to go over to Balliol College to have a beer and discussion on the courses. The former soon ran out but this did not inhibit the latter in any way.

The two lecturers on Friday were Mr J. Martyn, a barrister, and Mr K. S. Carmichael, F.C.A. Mr Martyn spoke to Part I and Part II candidates on the duties of directors and to Part I students only on the law of trusts. Mr Carmichael gave lectures to Part II students on corporation tax – shortfall and, capital gains tax – death; in the afternoon he spoke on loss claims to Part I students, in the familiar and interesting style which has become so well known both to students and members of the profession; a subject which, on the face of it, seemed lifeless and dull was made into an enlightening talk.

On Friday evening, the guest night dinner was held in Hall. Mr P. B. Jones, F.C.A., Chairman of the Joint Lecture Committee, proposed the toast of the College, and Dr R. E. Richard, F.R.S., Warden of Merton College, responded. Among the guests were three members of the Council of the Institute: Mr S. Dixon, M.A., J.P., F.C.A., a Past-President, Mr E. C. Sayers, F.C.A., and Mr R. F. Griffiths, F.C.A., together with Mr F. Withnall, F.C.A., President of the Society, and Mr K. J. Milligan, M.A., F.C.A., President of the senior Society.

On Saturday morning, after a talk on tax reform by Mr B. W. Sutherland, F.C.A., the groups dispersed to discuss the lecture and also the course generally. The overall opinion was that the occasion had been well worth while and interesting.

London Students at Balliol and Trinity

London's course, which was for Final students, dealt in depth with the many aspects of management accounting and was conducted by tutors of Caer Rhun Hall led by Mr John V. R. Anderson, M.A., A.C.A. It was the first residential course of its kind for the London Society to be run by accountancy tutors and its success merited the hope that it will not be the last.

Successive presidents have, in recent years, been urging upon members the need to do something useful for their clients and have emphasized that there should be more in the accountant's life than tax, auditing, and other associated subjects. It was with a view to inspiring practical help to management that CASSL mounted their course.

At the outset, all members were handed a most weighty but useful volume setting out in detail the lecture subjects, case study problems, and some extremely helpful definitions of various accountancy terms. This well-thought-out manual was also intended for further future studies.

There are few who could better Mr Anderson in getting a course under way. Drawing from his considerable store of humorous anecdotes he gently and ably led members into the tunnel of the 'Functions of management and the types of information required'.

At subsequent sessions he coped with a variety of topics – preparation of budgets, including budgets for working capital, and analysis of changes in working capital; marginal costing; break-even analysis and sales mix. He succeeded at all times in retaining a continuity of interest. Mr M. D. George, B.COM., A.C.A., also showed his skills in lecturing when he spoke on such subjects as investment appraisal and standard costing.

The study groups, a necessary and valuable part of any residential course, worked hard in consolidating on the many aspects which emerged from the lectures. Some members commented upon the fact that the education committee might well consider a qualified accountant as group leader for future courses as in the case of the Birmingham CASS.

Question and answer session

An interesting feature of the course was a question-and-answer period on the practical application and requirements of management when Mr C. J. Peyton, F.C.A., director and secretary, The Rover Co Ltd, answered questions put to him by Mr Anderson. So interested were the audience that the discussion was many times interrupted by questions from the body of the hall.

Introducing the session, Mr Anderson said to Mr Peyton, 'We have discussed the need for top management to create the right environment in which all levels of management can make decisions and we have also discussed the need for communication between top management and its subordinates. How do you manage to do this in the motor industry, i.e., how do you fix the objectives in the long-term and the short-term?'

Replying, Mr Peyton said, 'The objectives of my company both short and long-term are detailed in the operating budgets which are formulated after discussion with all the top managers concerned, they in turn consulting their own managers before making their proposals. The budgets are prepared on the basis of the sales forecast which is compiled from advice by market research after consultation with all overseas divisions.'

Mr Peyton went on to say that the sales budget, had, of course, to be matched to the productive capacity of the factory, details of which were supplied by the planning department who had complete details of the capacity available to produce all the units and spare parts in the specifications. The figures were prepared for the forthcoming year and this was known as the profit budget and were prepared for the following four years which, when allied to the profit budget, became the five-year profit plan.

In addition to the profit plan, estimates of the capital expenditure required to implement the sales programme and to maintain the factories were prepared in detail.

Mr Anderson then asked: 'We hear a lot about return on capital but no one seems to agree on the meaning of capital. How would you see it and would it be a rude question to ask what rate of return you aim for?'

Mr Peyton said that his company regarded capital as all the assets employed in the business less the current liabilities, adjusting for liabilities which were deferred such as taxation, purchase tax, etc. 'We aim for a return on capital of 20 per cent before tax on the capital employed.' It should be remembered, he said, that the fixed assets were only included at balance sheet values and not at current replacement values although, of course, there was a case for including fixed assets at current values bearing in mind that the majority of the current assets and liabilities were on this basis.

Appreciation

The Society were once again fortunate in having Mr Godfrey B. Judd, M.A., F.C.A., as course chairman. The Society would indeed have to look far for someone to match his delightful sense of humour which was appreciated by members and lecturers alike. Nor did the hard administrative work put in by the secretary, Mr Derek du Pré and his assistant, Miss Joyce Taylor, pass unnoticed. Mr Judd presided at the two guest night dinners at Balliol and Trinity when the principal guests included the Society's President, Mr G. R. Appleyard, F.C.A., Dr C. A. Jones, lecturer in Spanish at Trinity, and Mr Alan Brown, Vice-Provost of Worcester College.

COMPANIES (ACCOUNTS) REGULATIONS 1970

Under new Board of Trade regulations – the Companies (Accounts) Regulations 1970 – two exceptions are made from the requirement in Schedule 8 to the Companies Act 1948 that a company's balance sheet shall state the corresponding amounts at the end of the immediately preceding financial year for all items shown in the balance sheet.

Under the new regulations it will no longer be necessary to show the corresponding amount for the preceding year in respect of an amount shown in pursuance of paragraph 11 (6B) of the Schedule or as an amount the source or application of which is required by paragraph 7 of the Schedule to be shown.

Paragraph 11 (6B) is concerned with fixed assets which have been acquired or disposed of during the year ending on the balance sheet date, and paragraph 7 is concerned with the source or application of an increase or decrease in reserves at the balance sheet date as compared with the end of the preceding year.

The regulations came into operation on September 18th. They are published as SI 1970, No. 1333 and may be obtained from HMSO, price 4d, or 8d including postage.

Mr Edward Bell, F.C.A., completed 50 years of sterling service on August 11th, with Alfred G. Deacon & Co, Chartered Accountants, of Leicester (now merged with Pannell Fitzpatrick & Co). Deacon & Co as an office junior, subsequently qualified as an incorporated accountant in 1930, and later in his career became a partner in the present firm.

In recognition of his service, the resident partners of the firm entertained Mr and Mrs Bell at the Grand Hotel, Leicester, and presented him with the keys to a caravan that had been given to him as a token of appreciation.

100 not out

With the recent opening of its 100th branch (at Halesowen) the building society with the 'personal touch' reached another notable landmark.

We've been in business for more than a century and now we can boast more than one hundred branches throughout the United Kingdom.

Wherever we operate, we do our utmost to help and advise people on financial matters. It's service of this kind — personal and friendly — that has made us one of the largest building societies in the land.

We aim to keep it that way.

After all, with well over a hundred years behind us and more than a hundred branches to our credit, we think the 'personal touch' formula for success must be right!

Estate Duty Planning Seminar

For Accountants and Solicitors on Thursday and Friday
October 15th and 16th, 1970

Speakers include:

John Mowbray, B.A., Barrister-at-law (Author of Estate Duty on Settled Property and Editor of Lewin on Trusts)

F. A. Bevis, M.A., LL.B., A.C.A., A.T.I.I.
Solicitor

E. A. Holder, LL.B.
(Editor of Houseman on The Law of Life Assurance)

Advice on estate duty problems is one of the professional services clients are coming to expect as a matter of course. It can be a tough assignment for the busy man in general practice. Estate duty law frequently borders on the unintelligible, and the radical changes introduced by recent legislation are not simple.

The aim of the Seminar is to provide a practical analysis of the essential current law, and to examine in detail some important planning techniques for both the individual and the family business. Guidance will be given on the best use of gifts and exemptions, and the present function of the family settlement in estate duty planning will be fully analysed. There will be ample opportunity for questions and discussion, and a case study is provided in which all delegates can participate. A fully comprehensive manual will be distributed at the Seminar.

Fee: 25 guineas which includes luncheon (morning coffee and afternoon tea) on both days.

Venue: Royal Garden Hotel, London W8.

Brochures with registration forms can be obtained from or remittances (with names of delegates) may be sent direct to:

According to the National Economic Development Council Report on Management Recruiting and Development some 350,000 managers are engaged in the manufacturing industry alone. Their jobs and those of their colleagues elsewhere are changing. The new breed of managers are technologically-minded men eager for the right information on which to base their decisions.

Behind the change lies the evolution of management sciences and services – among them operational research, linear programming, network analysis, systems analysis, applications of the computer, consultancy, and marketing research.

The earlier chapters of this book are devoted to planning, organization, direction and policy-making and the process of decision.

Further the author tries to show where operational research, network analysis, computer installations, and consultancy come into activities. Finally he has examined the divisions of marketing and purchasing from the standpoint of a board of directors which is responsible for discharging planning and control functions rather than with the eyes of a sales or purchasing specialist.

For the director or chief executive, his review of basic management activities should strike answering chords. For middle management it should provide a stimulus to progress towards even higher responsibilities.

For the student of management whose immediate objective is the successful completion of a degree or diploma course, or who is on the way to achieving the status of a qualified accountant, cost accountant, company secretary, work study practitioner, purchasing officer, O. & M. manager, marketing manager, or training officer there should be a special benefit to be drawn from the author's integrated approach to his subject.
